AFFAIRS IN FRANCE.

Opening of the Legislative Session—Speech of the Emperor—Disappointment Caused by its New Party Measures—Fusion between the Old Majority and a Portion of the Tiers Parti, &c.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Monday, Nov. 29, 1869.

The opening of the Chambers took place to-day at 1 o'clock in the Salle des Etats at the Louvre. The ceremonial differed but little from that usually observed on such occasions. On the steps of the throne were ranged the Ministers and the members of the Privy Council, the Marshals and Admirals, and a deputation of the Grand Crosses of the Legion of Honor. Opposite the throne, on the right, were placed the Senate and the Council of State. The Deputies of the Corps Legislatif had seats allotted them on the left. A part of the upper gallery, on the right, was set apart for the Diplomatic Corps. Among the Ministers present were the Prince DE MONTMIRAIL, Ambassador of Austria, the Baron DE WERTHER, Ambassador from Prussia and the Confederation of the North; Lord LYONS, Ambassador from England; Count DE STACKELBERG, Ambassador of Russia; Mr. WASHBURNE, Minister from the United States, &c., &c. The gallery on the left was occupied by the wives of the Ministers and of the members of the Privy Council, Marshals and Admirals.

A battalion of the Imperial Guard, commanded by a Colonel, together with a battalion of the National Guard, formed the line from the Pavillon de l'Horloge to the Pavillon Denon, when the Emperor descended from his carriage. His Majesty was accompanied by the Prince Imperial, the Princes NAPOLEON, LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE, LUCIEN MURAT and all his military household. The tribune of the Empress was occupied by the Princess MATHILDE and the other Princesses of the Imperial family.

The Emperor took his place on the throne and delivered the following speech:

MESSRS. LES SENATEURS AND MESSRS. LES DEPUTES: It is not easy to establish in France the regular and peaceable use of liberty. For some months society has appeared to be menaced by subversive passions and liberty compromised by excesses of the Press, and of public reunions. Every man was asking himself to what extent the Government would be likely to tolerate. But already the good sense of the public has reacted against these culpable exaggerations; and impotent attacks have only served to demonstrate the solidity of the edifice founded by the suffrages of the people.

Nevertheless, the uncertainty and trouble which exist in the public mind must not be allowed to continue, and the situation more than ever demands promptness and decision. We must speak without equivocation and declare openly the will of the country.

France desires liberty, but with order. For that order I rely on the nation. And to guarantee to save liberty; to attain this object let us keep at an equal distance from reaction and revolutionary theories. Between those who pretend to preserve everything without change, and those who aspire to overturn everything, there is a glorious place to occupy.

When I proposed to you the Senatus Consultum of September last as a logical consequence of preceding reforms, and of the declaration made in my name by the Minister of State on the 24th of June, it was my intention to inaugurate resolutely a new era of conciliation and liberty. On your side, in accepting me in this path, you did not want to repudiate the past, to disarm power and to shaken the Empire to its foundations.

Our task consists now in applying the principles which have been laid down by introducing them in our laws and habits.

The measures that the Ministry will present for your approbation have all a character sincerely liberal. If you adopt them the following ameliorations will be realized:

The Mayors will be chosen from among the members of the Municipal Councils, save in exceptional cases provided for by the law; at Lyons, as in the suburban communes of Paris, the formation of these Councils will devolve on universal suffrage; in Paris, where the interests of the city are allied with those of the whole of France, the Municipal Council will be elected by the Legislative Body, already invested with the right of regulating the extraordinary budget of the capital.

Cantonal Councils will be instituted mainly to unite the cantonal resources and direct their employment.

Fresh guarantees will be granted to the Conseils Generaux.

The citizens will participate in this movement of decentralization.

In the a law enlarging the circle in which universal suffrage moves, will determine the public functions compatible with the mandate of deputy.

To these reforms of administration and political order will be added legislative measures of more immediate interest to the populations: The more rapid development of the gratuitous course of primary instruction, the diminution of the expense of the postal service, the repeal of the tax of half a decime, which weighs on the rights of registration in the case of succession; the rendering access to savings banks more easy, and the placing them within the reach of the rural populations by the aid of the agents of the Treasury; the more humane legislation of the labor of children in manufactories, and the increase of small salaries.

Other important questions, the solution of which is not yet ready, are under consideration.

The inquiry relative to agriculture is terminated, and some propositions will result from it as soon as the Superior Commission will have deposited its report.

Another inquiry relative to the octrois has been commenced.

A project of Customs law, reproducing the general tariff, which have given rise to no serious contestation, will be laid before you; with regard to the treaties which have been concluded, the most of certain indications the Government will make you no proposition until it is in possession of all the information necessary to throw light on your deliberations.

The state of the State of Europe presents satisfactory results. Trade has not been arrested and the indirect taxes, whose natural increase is a sign of prosperity and confidence, have yielded thus far 20,000,000 more than last year. The running budgets offer notable surpluses, and that of 1871 will permit us to undertake the amelioration of several services, and to suitably provide for the public works.

But it is not sufficient to propose reforms, to introduce economies in the finances, and to effect good administration; it is requisite, in addition, by an attitude clear and firm, for the public powers to accord with the Government, to show that the more we enlarge the circle in which the free use of our rights is maintain intact, and beyond the reach of violence, the interests of society and the principles of the Constitution. A Government which is the legitimate expression of the national will has the duty and the power to cause itself to be respected, for it has both the right and strength to do so.

If from the interior I turn my regards beyond our frontiers, I congratulate myself on finding foreign Powers maintaining friendly relations with us. Both sovereigns and nations desire peace, and occupy themselves with the progress of civilization.

Whatever regrettable may be addressed to our epoch, we have, nevertheless, many reasons to be proud of it. The New World has suppressed slavery; Russia has affranchised her serfs; England has done justice to Ireland; the dawn of the Mediterranean seems to recall its ancient splendor, and from the reunion at Rome of all the Bishops of the Catholic Church, we have a right to expect only a work of pacification and conciliation.

The puissances of science is drawing nations closer to each other. While America unites the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic by a railroad of a thousand leagues in length, we everywhere find capital and intelligence concerting to join by electric lines of communication the most distant countries of the globe. France and Italy are about to group hands through the tunnel of the Alps; the waters of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea are already being connected in the Suez Canal.

All Europe has caused itself to be represented in Egypt at the inauguration of that gigantic enterprise, and if to-day the Empress is present at the opening of the Chambers, it is because it has been my desire that by her presence in a country where our arms formerly distinguished themselves she should testify the sympathy of France for a work which is due to the perseverance and genius of a Frenchman.

You will now gentlemen resume the extraordinary session which was interrupted by the prorogation of the Senatus Consultum. After the verification of powers the ordinary session will immediately commence. It will bring with it, I have no doubt, happy results. The great bodies of the State, more intimately united, will come to an understanding to apply loyally the last modifications introduced in the Constitution.

The more direct participation of the country in its own affairs will be a new source of strength for the Empire. The assemblies will henceforth have a larger share of responsibility. Let them employ it to the profit of the grandeur and prosperity of the nation. Let different shades of opinion since themselves when the general interests demand it, and let the Chambers, by their enlightenment as by their patriotism, prove that France, without relapsing into regrettable excesses, is capable of supporting the free institutions which are the honor of civilized countries.

Partial applause greeted the close of the speech, which, I must add, has been received outside with great disappointment.

An event of evil augury for the Liberal future of the Empire has preceded the Imperial utterances. I allude to the dissolution of the Tiers Parti, or the group of the Gauche Ferre, as it is more familiarly called, and of the union of a greater portion of the latter with the rank and file of the old majority. This fusion was accomplished yesterday by the combined efforts of MM. EMILE OLLIVIER, SAGRIS and JEROME DAVID. The result is the adjournment of the interpellations, which have been so eagerly anticipated by the public, until after the verification of the disputed elections. The Constitutionnel gives the key to this manœuvre when it says that there is but one Ministerial combination possible. "It is that," it adds, "which will be formed by the union of the most liberal and the most important of the present Ministers with the most influential members of the Centre Gauche."

This is not what the country hopes or desires, and the coalition I fear will be productive of the most evil results.

ENGLISH NEWS AND GOSSIP.

The Ritualist Mission in the Metropolis—Wretched Condition of the English Poor—The King of Belgium Entertained.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Wednesday, Dec. 1, 1869.

The Ritualist mission in the metropolis has attracted a great deal of attention, and seems to have met with an unexpected degree of success. I wrote that seventy churches had joined in the movement. Afterward the number was increased to 120. If 500 persons were interested in each, more or less, the whole number would reach 60,000. The Times has thought enough of the movement to give several columns to it. It is the first thing of the kind in the Church of England, since the Reformation. For 300 hundred years there has been no such organized and continuous assault on Satan's kingdom. The Church has been calm, respectable, dull; and those who wished to go faster or do more were driven into dissent. The missions in the Catholic Church, a writer in the Times says, were begun by IGNATIUS LOYOLA; so that revivals are a part of the Jesuitical system—but I suspect that they are much older. There were protracted meetings, and seasons of unusual religious effort and excitement 1,800 years ago in the mountains of Judea; and for ages before that, all Israel assembled at stated seasons in Jerusalem for continuous and extraordinary religious services.

But such a work is utterly new in the English Reformed Church; and it has all the attraction of novelty. The Church of St. Albans, just north of Holborn, is in one of the poorest and most crowded districts in London, and not only the spacious church, but its large schoolrooms, were filled with the poor people—women with babies, roughs, and unfortunates, gathered in by the Angelican sisters to be preached to, talked to, perhaps for the first time in their lives in this fashion. And this may well be the case with great numbers, for it is estimated that there are one million of persons in London entirely outside all churches and chapels of every description; as truly heathen as Dr. LIVINGSTONE's friends in the heart of Africa. Whatever the result may be to them, the Mission must have a great effect in the future. The Ritualists are pledged to go on as they have begun; the Evangelicals cannot afford to be surpassed in zeal; the old high and dry party will be shamed into doing something most unexpectedly. The Low Church Bishop of London has given his full sanction to the work, confessions and all, and one of the last acts of the late Bishop, now Archbishop of Canterbury, was to express his sympathy with the movement. It was time. The Church has been slowly waking to life for thirty years past; but this was too slow. A whole generation has gone down in that time, and poverty, ignorance, irreligion and vice have not been lessened. More intoxicating liquors are drunk now than thirty years ago—more than five years ago, in proportion to the population.

In some parishes they followed the example of St. FRANCIS XAVIER, and went round ringing a bell every morning, and announcing with stentorian voice the services of the day; in others, short addresses were made in the streets from Moosteps, adapted for the purpose. Every means was taken to draw people from the highways and hedges. And not too soon. In the parish of Bermey there are 12,000 inhabitants, of whom, it is said, 10,000 have never been in any place of worship. At St. Barnabas, Pimlico, one of the oldest Ritualist churches in London, and from which the greatest number of curates have come over to Rome, the principal match preacher has been the Rev. C. E. GRAFTON, an American clergyman, but now an Evangelical Father. A writer in the Guardian says one of his sermons was "the most impressive he ever heard. The preacher every now and then succeeded in a feat which we see only on rare occasions performed—every now and then he riveted the attention of his hearers so absolutely that not even the sound of breathing could be heard." At St. Mary-the-Loss, (Lambeth), Mr. GLADSTONE has been seen more than once during the mission services. At many of the churches the concluding services were of a very striking character. At St. Albans and the more advanced of the Ritualist churches, after prayers, sermon, confessions, &c., candles were blessed and distributed among those who had engaged most earnestly in the mission. In St. Albans about 200 persons, of every age and class, stood up with lighted candles in their hands and renewed their baptismal vows, and then marched round the church singing in procession, with the greatest fervor, all ending with a solemn Te Deum. It is believed that several thousand persons, who have never been to church in their lives, have during this mission been brought under instruction and Church influence by these extraordinary efforts, and by means hitherto used only by Roman Catholics and Dissenters.

As a rule the mission has met with respectful treatment from the Press. In one case I have heard the preaching criticised, and a Broad Church parson says that where he went some persons thought that the people were bowing to the large brass eagle used as a lectern, instead of the altar.

THE POOR LABORER.

Fifty years ago Dr. HAYGARTH wrote some admirable directions for the stamping out of contagious fevers. They are boiled by dirt and destitution. They are prevented and cured by the opposite conditions. But the English lower classes seem to be quite as badly off now as they were fifty years ago. The Spectator calls attention to the fact that there is a land question in England, as well as in Ireland. Something must be done to remedy "the shocking condition of the agricultural laborer." Some strong impulse is needed to break up the existing system.

"And short of insurrection—which God forbid! for in English agrarian war the weapon would not be the bayonet, but the torch—the only efficient impulse to such reform. That insurrection will be the remedy there is no manner of doubt. The emigration toward the towns is already enormous, is, for example, crushing the poorer ratepayers of London, and driving Mr. GOSCHEN to despair; and, as the pressure increases, and with the pressure knowledge, the stream will flow to the colonies, and we shall see the Irish scene in the south and east of Britain. Even now, if the people even only knew, they would depart by entire villages, and it is noticed that if two or three families go the whole parish becomes restless."

And once more, let me ask, why cannot these poor, honest, hard-toiling English laborers be taken to America, on contracts similar to those proposed for Chinese, by some capitalist or company? I believe hundreds of thousands of sturdy men would be too happy to agree to work five years for their bare subsistence, for the chance of a future home on the land for themselves and their families. And these people, poor, ignorant, demoralized, drunken as they may be, are of the old stock of our ancestors—"our own flesh and blood," as Mr. GLADSTONE says; and if the men are imbruted by their desperate conditions, the women are for the most part honest, pious, good souls, and the children are often beautiful, and need only good conditions and good education to become a treasure to any country that can give them proper treatment. Why is it that the Mormons alone, under all the disadvantages of their position, can carry out a large system of immigration? The English laborer has no proper food, no suitable dwelling, no chance of ever possessing land, of being other than the miserable serf he is, unless there is a great change in England—and a change which is not a revolution may be so long in coming as to be of no use to the present generation. It has been talked about for half a century; in another half century it may possibly be accomplished.

I find some curious figures in the Birmingham Post, showing that the worse people are clothed the more they drink; or, it may be, that the more they drink the worse they are clothed. In 1860 the home consumption of cotton in this country was, in round numbers, 218,000,000 pounds. In 1868 it was 197,482,000 pounds. This, says the writer, shows that the richest nation in the world is in rags, and the reason is that they drink what they should wear. In 1860 they spent $79,841,320 on alcoholic liquors, in 1868 this amount had increased to $100,898,920. The increase of drink is about 20 per cent., the decrease of cotton for home consumption 36 per cent. Another fact equally significant is given. When immense quantities of grain are imported, and the poor in many places are wanting food, the brewers and distillers are busy, and making large fortunes in the work of turning bread into poison. In the Caledonian Distillery at Edinburgh, for example, 40,000 gallons of spirits are manufactured weekly, or 2,000,000 per annum. The quantity of grain destroyed is 800,000 bushels, and all the work is done by 150 men. If the same capital were employed in the cotton manufacture it would give work to some thousands, spreading wealth and comfort instead of poverty and misery.

If the Turks, under their system of general education, should take to reading English newspapers, what must they think of the morals and polity of this "foremost of the nations of Christendom?"

THE VISIT OF THE KING OF BELGIUM.

The visit of the King of Belgium to the Queen at Windsor Castle has been taken advantage of to enliven the dullness, though nothing can illuminate the fogs of an English November. At Buckingham Palace he has received addresses from the officers of the volunteers, headed by the Prince of WALES, most of whom have been his guests at Brussels and Liege, and from the Corporation of London. He has also received the freedom of the city in a gold box, which will allow him to cross the Holborn Viaduct without paying toll, provided he always carries the gold box in his pocket, and has had a grand banquet and ball at the Mansion House. His Majesty speaks English with fluency; and, as this is what very few Englishmen are able to do, he is greatly admired for such a rare accomplishment.

Suppose we turn to less important matters. For example, we are going to have a dozen or so new theatres in London. The dramatists are used up, but there are still translators and adapters, and Frenchmen cannot help writing plays. Cela se sous dire. The two enterprises most advanced are a grand theatre and Winter garden on the north side of Leicester-square, and one on Sloane-square, for Belgravia and Chelsea. Not forgetting Miss OLIVER's new theatre in the Strand, where theatres now so swarm that an old-fashioned New-York fire would burn down a dozen. "Formosa" and the "Clever Voices Family" will run at Drury-lane until the Christmas pantomime. There is no sign of change at Mrs. JOHN WOOD's St. James. One sensation scene, with excellent thunder and lightning, still carries on that heavy piece, "The Turn of the Tide," at the new Queen's, and J. S. CLARK is ticketed for a ten years' run of "Toodles," at the Strand, where they give four funny pieces every night, and if you stop laughing as long as the curtain is up you are taken out kindly by the Police and sent to a lunatic asylum. Important Events at Hand—Males and Females Pressed into Salnave's Service—Secret Operations at the Palace—Foreigners Ordered to Leave and Imprisoned—Ruin and Starvation.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Saturday, Nov. 20.

There are indications here of some important events about to transpire. SALNAVE's soldiers, and every man and youth—and even women—he can press into his service, are at work on the fortifications of the city. Earthworks are being thrown up, and cannon rapidly placed in position. The national palace, which consists of a number of straggling one-storied buildings, has been incompassed with hastily-constructed fortifications. Two cannons from the Pequod have been put in position.

Within the precincts of the palace a number of soldiers are engaged upon some secret service. As these men are allowed no communication with outsiders, the nature of the work they are engaged upon ..... as yet been revealed. Many rumors, however, prevail, one of which is to the effect that excavations and subterraneous operations are on hand.

Several foreigners have recently been ordered by SALNAVE to leave the island, and others have been imprisoned without trial, and without any reasons being assigned. Great consternation prevails among the white residents generally, and the majority of them would only be too glad to have an opportunity of quitting the distracted country.

SALNAVE is daily issuing proclamations, in which he slaughters his enemies and delivers his country.

Things are at serious price. Little or nothing comes into market, and hundreds in the city and neighborhood are perishing from starvation. In fact, it is almost impossible to describe the present dreadful state of affairs. Bread cannot be bought. Flour is scarce; and what little there is the holders are unwilling to sell.

SALNAVE has declared the town of Port-au-Prince and the Department of the West in a state of siege.

Exchange 5,800 to 4,000.

WASHINGTON.

The House and the Census Bill—Readmission of Virginia—Proposals of Speedy Adjustment—Currency Statistics—Miscellaneous.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The House made very little progress in the Census bill today, the best portion of the session having been consumed in disputing and discussing on the franking privilege question. About two-thirds of the bill has been finished; but at the present rate of progress it will not be ready to go to the Senate before Wednesday unless night sessions are held.

THE VIRGINIA QUESTION.

The Committee on Reconstruction held a meeting this morning on the subject of the admission of Virginia. Representatives PAINE, RUSK and WARD were appointed a sub-committee to superintend the printing of the statement of Ex-Governor WELLS, Republican, in which it is stated he expresses himself in favor of immediate admission and the abolition of all test oaths and disfranchisement. Also, the printing of the speech of Governor WALKER, recently made before the Committee, showing the loyalty and good faith of the people to carry out their professions, and earnestly representative for admission; and the report of the Legislative Committee of Virginia, and that of the minority, and General CANBY's report to the War Department, giving the result of the State elections. The Reconstruction Committee also directed to be made an abstract of fifty affidavits charging fraud in the election; but this is not to be printed. The members of the Committee attach little, if any, importance to the charges, being generally satisfied of fair election. The Committee will meet again on Tuesday morning. There seems to be no doubt that the bill for the admission of Virginia will be passed next week, and soon thereafter the United States Senators and Representatives will be sworn in, with the exception of Messrs. BOOKER and MCKENZIE, whose seats are contested. It is probable that the admission of Virginia will be coupled with the condition precedent that the State Constitution shall not be amended by the present Legislature. Gentlemen who have seen Ex-Governor WELLS' statement say that he recommends the passage of the Amnesty bill.

The following letter from Ex-Governor WELLS, of Virginia, was laid before the Reconstruction Committee to-day:

RICHMOND, Va., Dec. 10, 1869.

Colonel B. A. Rusk:

MY DEAR SIR: I had hoped there would be at the opening of Congress no element of embarrassment in Washington on the subject of the immediate recognition of Virginia, and on enquiring at what date it could return to the Union, Congress has an answer. We have arrived, it seems to me, at a stage in the work of peace and reconciliation, which ought to astonish the nation. If any evil which may exist here by a longer exclusion of Federal representation to the State, the Conservative not Democrat will be made responsible, that the thought of vindictive any spirit of animosity be encouraged, or oblivion for the past be secured by either an exclusion of State or individuals from many of the rights which belong to the citizens of other States or citizens. Whether such desirable results were likely to be secured by test oaths and disfranchisements or not, it is certain they can have no operation from this time forward.

If we are ever to secure prosperity in our national interests, harmony in our social relations, or justice and equality in political rights and privileges it must be done by such a universal act of oblivion as shall, as derived, leave it out of the power of such for inflicting injustice upon others in retaliation for wrongs or political disabilities suffered by himself. One may doubt the issue, or even believe that such a measure of liability will fail of any happy results. Still it is the only refuge now left, and who can right not to hesitate about making the trial. It should be done, and done in a magnanimous spirit, and fully, freely, with the broadest generosity. It is idle to find fault with, or cavil at, the means or way by which we have been brought to this condition. It is entirely immaterial how Republican Party has been constituted, nor shall we be likely to contemplate its overthrow more gratefully by longer indulging in animosity, bitterness or recrimination. I sincerely hope that Virginia may be restored to her place in the Union without a single dissenting vote; that before the Christmas holidays, by one single act of amnesty, the disabilities of every citizen of this Commonwealth may be removed, and the Republican Party, and there individuals for relief, not because of their superior claims, but rather on account of the friends they have at court, or the diligence with which they move Washington, is plainly unwelcome and manifestly unjust. It tends largely to aggravate the irritation already existing. The lot men whose disabilities are in this way removed, are not thereby rendered any more loyal than the Government stands before the world, while all the others, unrelieved, find in this last act of unjust Congressional discrimination, a new cause of more substantial complaint, dislike and bitterness. It seems to me, nothing but a full measure. Sever the knot by one blow; unite all hands by one word. If this policy does not succeed, then no other can afford any reasonable hope of a better result. I hope that you will use your influence to secure the success and early adoption of this policy.

I remain, Very dear Sir, Yours truly,

(Signed) H. H. WELLS.

COIN IN THE TREASURY.

The coin balance in the Treasury to-day, including $27,263,840 of gold certificates, was $103,063,962 52. The currency balance was $12,000,828 17.

THE SECOND ACQUITTAL OF SHERMAN.

SHERMAN, who was tried some time ago on a charge of abstracting $12,000 from the Treasury, and acquitted, owing to a flaw in the indictment, was again acquitted this P. M. on a fresh trial for the same offence.

MR. INGERSOLL'S BILL IN THE HOUSE.

The struggle between the Banking and Currency and the Ways and Means Committee was renewed in the House to-day, when the former gained a decided advantage. Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. GARFIELD were unnecessarily excited on the subject, and while the discussion of the voting lasted, there was quite a little breeze in the House.

INDIAN DELEGATIONS.

A circular has been issued from the Indian Office forbidding the visits of delegations of Indians to Washington for the purpose of transacting the business of their respective tribes before the Department. It is the opinion of the Commissioner that their business can be much better accomplished by their agent, and it is held that the money which would be expended in bringing them here would be used to much better advantage in buying them provisions, agricultural implements and annuity goods.

FORTY-FIRST CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Dec. 11.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WARD presented a petition of the Chemung County (New-York) Medical Society, for an increase of the rank of the Naval Medical officers.

Mr. STARKWEATHER presented a petition of the citizens of New-London, Conn., that coal be admitted free of duty.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were, by unanimous consent, introduced and referred, as follows:

By Mr. BENNETT—To authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the Niagara River.

By Mr. TANNER—To regulate the importation of lumber on the Northern, Northeastern and Northwestern frontiers of the United States.

By Mr. WOODWARD—To change the name of the Wyoming National Bank of Tunkhannock, Penn., to that of the "First National Bank of Tunkhannock."

By Mr. WELKER—To dispense with the spies and informers in the internal revenue service.

By Mr. BARGHART—For the sale of certain lands in California.

By J. R. MOORE, of Illinois—To authorize the payment of bounty to certain volunteer army officers.

By Mr. PRINE, of Nevada—To create an additional district in Nevada.

By Mr. BAXTER—To amend the act declaring and fixing the rank of retired officers of the army.

By Mr. HALE—Amendatory of the Naturalization laws.

Mr. KNOX introduced a bill to amend the criminal laws in relation to delay in jury in the Federal Courts. Referred to the Judiciary Committee.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions were offered and adopted as follows:

By Mr. BURNHAM—Calling on the Secretary of War for information as to the number of Indian troops in the battle of Hyssian Moss, and as to the amount necessary to repay it.

By Mr. DAWES—Calling on the Clerk of the House for a detailed account of the expenditures of the present Congress.

By Mr. BLEDSOE—Calling on the Secretary of War for information relative to the trouble at Fort Washington, Caudoe County, Ala., including the reports and estimates of engineers, &c.

By Mr. SCOFIELD—Requiring the Supervising Architect of the Treasury to take into consideration the question of suitable buildings in the City of Erie, Penn., for the accommodation of the United States Courts.

Mr. DAWES asked leave to offer a resolution calling on the President for information as to whether any further legislation is necessary to enable the Executive to secure more perfect neutrality in any struggle between the Spanish Power and its American colony, whenever the latter is seeking in good faith by revolution to assert the right of self-government, so that the hospitality and privileges of the ports of the United States may not be extended to either party to the prejudice or exclusion of the other.

Mr. WOOD objected, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, asked leave to offer a resolution to annul the late Tennessee election.

Mr. WOOD objected.

VIRGINIA.

Mr. PAINE, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported the following described papers in reference to the admission of Virginia, which were ordered to be printed:

General CANBY's report to the Secretary of War relative to the election in Virginia, in July, 1869; the address of the Republican Central Committee, presented to the Senate by G. P. CORNING; the statement of Mr. HUGHES, endorsed by Mr. WITCHER; the statement of Governor WELLS; the memorial of the Committee of the Virginia Legislature, presented by Z. TURNER, Speaker of the House of Delegates; the statement of Governor WALKER before the Committee; the opinion of Attorney-General Hoar; Virginia affairs; the statement that there were about fifty affidavits before the Committee from persons in various parts of the State, charging, in some instances, a failure on the part of the registering officers to register, and a refusal in others to permit the affiant to vote when registered, and in others that threats from persons on the Conservative side and intimidations were resorted to, to prevent persons from voting the Republican ticket, and that they were prevented from voting.

THE CURRENCY QUESTION.

Mr. INGERSOLL again introduced his bill authorizing an additional issue of legal-tender notes to the amount of $44,000,000, and moved its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD remarked that he thought the House had had that bill offered for the last two or three mornings.

Mr. INGERSOLL said it had, and that it would have it for two or three mornings more until it was referred.

Mr. GARFIELD moved its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL inquired of the Speaker whether an objection would prevent the introduction of the bill now.

The Speaker said it would not.

Mr. COX thought the House had better postpone the consideration of the subject for the present. It ought to be ventilated.

Mr. GARFIELD thought the question of reference might as well be settled now as at any other time.

Mr. INGERSOLL insisted on his motion of reference, and it moved the previous question. The previous question was seconded.

Mr. JUDD demanded the reading of the bill. The bill was read.

It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue additional legal-tender notes of the denomination hereinafter issued, and in such proportion as he may deem best, to the amount of $44,000,000; $10,000,000 to be issued within thirty days after the passage of this act; $10,000,000 within sixty days; $10,000,000 more within ninety days, and the remaining $14,000,000 within 120 days. The second section directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase with such notes the 5-20 bonds of the United States, and to cancel the same in the manner provided by law.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD inquired of the Speaker whether there had been any decision in half measures.

The Speaker replied that it was, and that the House could dispose of it.

Mr. COX remarked that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania (SCOFIELD) wanted a decision of the House between an inflation and contraction of the currency, now was the time.

Mr. SCOFIELD supposed that those who wanted to inflate the currency would vote against his motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken and the motion rejected—yeas, 65; nays, 68. The following is the vote in detail:

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Armstrong, Arnella, Beatty, Bennett, Boles, Burchard, Burdett, Burr, Butler of Massachusetts, Butler of Tennessee, Calkin, Cason, Cobb of Wisconsin, Coburn, Cook, Cowles, Creba, Culloom, Davis, Dawes, Dickinson, Dockery, Dodge, Dyer, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fitch, Gilfillan, Griswold, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hawley, Hay, Hess, Hill, Hoge, Hogan of South Carolina, Holman, Hubbard, Johnson, Jones of North Carolina, Judd, Julian, Knott, Lawrence, Loughridge, Mayham, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McCrary, Mercur, Negley, Niblack, Orth, Packard, Paine, Peters, Pomeroy, Prosser, Rice, Rogers, Sargent, Sheldon of Louisiana, Smith of Oregon, Smith of Tennessee, Smyth of Iowa, Stevenson, Stokes, Stone, Strader, Swenty, Tabb, Tanner, Tillman, Tyner, Upson, Van Trump, Wallace, Walls, Washburn of Illinois, Williams, Wilson of Minnesota, Witcher, Wood—78.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD's motion to refer to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays, remarking that four members of that Committee, who had just voted, had voted to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency—yeas 68, nays 67.

THE CENSUS BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DAWES in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the Census bill, commencing at section seventeen. The subject of allowing census officers the franking privilege, and the question of compensation, &c., were discussed as considerable length. An amendment refusing them the franking privilege, which was offered by Mr. HARKWORTH, was withdrawn by him on condition that it might be offered in the House and a vote had upon it. The Committee rose, after disposing of only one section—the seventeenth—and a new print of the bill, as amended, was ordered.

The House at 5:30 o'clock adjourned.

The Fifteenth Amendment in Ohio.

The Ohio Republican State Central and State Executive Committee had a meeting in Columbus on Thursday. Among the resolutions adopted unanimously was the following:

Resolved, As the late State election the Republican Party achieved a signal triumph in the election of its candidates for State offices and a majority of the members of the General Assembly, as a pledge of the fidelity of the Republican Party to the political and commercial interests of our Commonwealth, and earnestly vindicating and defending the political rights of all its citizens; therefore

Resolved, That we hail with pleasure the unequivocal and final consummation of the expressed will of the people by an early ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the National Constitution by the Legislature about to assemble, thereby placing Ohio where she properly belongs, in the advanced rank of freedom, by securing equal and exact justice before the law, to all classes of her citizens.

FAREWELL.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Who ask how came it so? The same
Happens to others every day.
By chance or fate the meeting came;
Which—who shall say?

It was not much that either said,
But each felt richer for that night;
You turned, as I drew near, so red;
When I went, white.

And then came meetings day by day.
Our only thought near, sun and moon.
The Summer quickly passed away;
Indeed, too soon.

We pressed fond hands; for much—or nought;
For nothing, foolish tears let fall;
We quarrelled, and were reconciled;
And meant it all.

Then Autumn came, and Winter white;
The swallows fled to skies of blue;
Love?—It was freezing day and night;
It froze us too.

I to other lands went, you said, courteously;
Countess, I kissed your hand, and so—
Is it not so?

"THE SHADOW OF A SHADE."

BY TOM HOOD.

My sister Lettie has lived with me ever since I had a home of my own. She was my little housekeeper before I married. Now she is my wife's constant companion, and the "darling aunts" of my children, who go to her for comfort, advice, and aid in all their little troubles and perplexities.

But, though she has a comfortable home, and loving hearts around her, she wears a grave, melancholy look on her face, which puzzles acquaintances and grieves friends.

A disappointment! Yes, the old story of a lost lover is the reason for Lettie's looks. She has had good offers often; but since she lost the first love of her heart, she has never indulged in the happy dream of loving and being beloved.

George Mason was a cousin of my wife's—a sailor by profession. He and Lettie met one another at our wedding, and fell in love at first sight. George's father had seen service before him on the great mysterious sea, and had been especially known as a good Arctic sailor, having shared in more than one expedition in search of the North Pole and the Northwest Passage.

It was not a matter of surprise to me, therefore, when George volunteered to go out in the Pioneer, which was being fitted out for a cruise in search of FRANKLIN and his missing expedition. There was a fascination about such an undertaking that I felt I could not have resisted had I been in his place. Of course Lettie did not like the idea at all, but he silenced her by telling her that men who volunteered for Arctic search were never lost sight of, and that he should not make so much advance in his profession in a dozen years as he would in the year or so of this expedition. I cannot say that Lettie, even after this, was quite satisfied with the notion of his going, but, at all events, she did not argue against it any longer. But the grave look, which is now habitual with her, but was a rare thing in her young and happy days, passed over her face sometimes when she thought no one was looking.

My younger brother, Harry, was, at this time, an academy student. He was only a beginner then. Now he is pretty well known in the art world, and his pictures command fair prices. Like all beginners in art, he was full of fancies and theories. He would have been a pre-Raphaelite, only pre-Raphaelism had not been invented then. His peculiar craze was for what he styled the Venetian school. Now it chanced that George had a fine, Italian-looking head, and Harry persuaded him to sit to him for his portrait. It was a fair likeness, but a very moderate work of art. The background was so very dark, and George's red costume so very deep in color, that the face came out too white and staring. It was a three-quarter picture; but only one hand showed in it, leaning on the hilt of a sword. As George said, he looked much more like the commander of a Venetian galley than a modern man.

However, the picture pleased Lettie, who did not care much about the art, provided the resemblance was good. So the picture was duly framed—in a tremendously heavy frame of Harry's ordering—and hung up in the dining room.

And now the time for George's departure was growing nearer. The Pioneer was nearly ready to sail, and her crew only waited orders. The officers grew acquainted with each other before sailing, which was an advantage. George took up very warmly with the surgeon, Vincent Grieve, and with my permission brought him to dinner once or twice.

"Poor chap, he has no friends nearer than the Highlands, and it's precious lonely work."

"Bring him, by all means, George! You know that any friends of yours will be welcome here."

So Vincent Grieve came. I am bound to say I was not favorably impressed by him, and almost wished I had not consented to his coming. He was a tall, pale, fair young man, with a hard, Scotch face, and a cold, gray eye. There was something in his expression, too, that "was unpleasant—something cruel or crafty, or both.

I considered that it was very bad taste for him to pay such marked attention to Lettie, coming, as he did, as the friend of her fiancé. He kept by her constantly, and anticipated George in all the little attentions which a lover delights to pay. I think George was a little put out about it, though he said nothing, attributing his friend's offence to lack of breeding.

Lettie did not like it at all. She knew that she was not to have George with her much longer, and she was anxious to have him to herself as much as possible. But as Grieve was her lover's friend, she bore the infliction with the best possible patience.

The surgeon did not seem to perceive, in the least, that he was interfering where he had no business. He was quite self-possessed and happy, with one exception. The portrait of George seemed to annoy him. He had uttered a little impatient exclamation when he first saw it, which drew my attention to it, and I noticed that he tried to avoid looking at it. At last, when dinner came, he was told to sit exactly facing the picture. He hesitated for an instant, and then sat down, but almost immediately rose again.

"It's very childish, and that sort of thing," he stammered, "but I cannot sit opposite that picture."

"It is not high art," I said, "and may irritate a critical eye."

"I know nothing about art," he answered, "but it is one of those unpleasant pictures whose eyes follow you about the room. I have an inherited horror of such pictures. My mother married against her father's will and when I was born she was so ill she was hardly expected to live. When she was sufficiently recovered to speak without delirious rambling, she implored them to remove a picture of my grandfather, that hung in the room, and which she vowed made threatening faces at her. It's superstitious, but constitutional—I have a horror of such paintings."

I believe George thought this was a ruse of his friends to get a seat next to Lettie; but I felt sure it was not, for I had seen the alarmed expression of his face.

At night, when George and his friend were leaving, I took an opportunity to ask the former, half in a joke, if he should bring the surgeon to see us again. George made a very hearty assertion to the contrary, adding that he was pleasant enough company among men at an inn, or on board ship, but not where ladies were concerned.

But the mischief was done. Vincent Grieve took advantage of the introduction, and did not wait to be invited again. He called the next day, and nearly every day after. He was a more frequent visitor than George now for George was obliged to attend to his duties, and they kept him on board the Pioneer pretty constantly, whereas the surgeon, having seen to the supply of drugs, &c., was pretty well at liberty. Lettie avoided him as much as possible, but he generally brought, or professed to bring, some little message from George to her, so that he had an excuse for asking to see her.

On the occasion of his last visit—the day before the Pioneer sailed—Lettie came to me in great distress. The young cub had actually the audacity to tell her he loved her. He knew, he said, about her engagement to George, but that did not prevent another man from loving her, too. A man could no more help falling in love than he could help taking a fever. Lettie stood upon her dignity, and rebuked him severely; but he told her he could see no harm in telling her of his passion, though he knew it was a hopeless one.

"A thousand things may happen," he said, at last, "to bring your engagement with George Mason to an end. Then, perhaps, you will not forget that another loves you."

I was very angry, and was forthwith going to give him my opinion on his conduct, when Lettie told me he was gone, that she had bade him go, and had forbidden him the house. She only told me in order to protect herself, for she did not intend to say anything to George for fear it should lead to a duel or some other violence.

That was the last we saw of Vincent Grieve before the Pioneer sailed.

George came the same evening, and was with us till daybreak, when he had to tear himself away, and join his ship.

After shaking hands with him at the door, in the cold, gray, drizzly dawn, I turned back into the dining room, where poor Lettie was sobbing on the sofa.

I could not help starting, when I looked at Georges portrait, which hung above her. The strange light of day-break could hardly account for the extraordinary pallor of the face. I went close to it, and, I could hard at it. I saw that it was covered with moisture, and imagined that this possibly made it look so pale. As for the moisture, I suppose poor Lettie had been kissing the beloved portrait, and that the moisture was caused by her tears.

It was not all a long time after, when I was jestingly telling Harry how his picture had been tarnished, that I learnt the error of my conjecture. Lettie assured me, quite seriously, that I was mistaken in supposing she had kissed it.

"It was the varnish blooming, I expect," said Harry. And thus the subject was dismissed, for I said no more, though I knew well enough, in spite of my not being an artist, that the bloom of varnish was quite another sort of thing.

The Pioneer sailed. We received—or, rather, Lettie received—two letters from George, which he had taken the opportunity of sending by homeward-bound whalers. In the second he said it was hardly likely he should have an opportunity of touching at another, as they were sailing into high latitudes—into the solitary sea, to which none but expedition ships ever penetrated. They were all in high spirits, he said, for they had encountered very little ice, and hoped to find clear water farther north than usual. Moreover, he added, Grieve had held a sinecure so far, for there had not been a single case of illness on board.

Then came a long silence, and a year crept away very slowly, for poor Lettie. Once we heard of the expedition from the papers. They were reported as pushing on, and progressing favorably, by a wandering tribe of Esquimaux, with whom the Captain of a Russian whaleship had met. They had laid the ship up for the Winter, and were taking the boats on sledges, and believed they had met with traces of the lost crews, that seemed to show they were on the right track.

The Winter passed again, and Spring came. It was balmy, bright Spring, such as we get occasionally, even in this changeable and uncertain climate of ours.

One evening we were sitting in the dining room, with the window open, for the room was so oppressively warm that we were glad of the breath of the cool evening breeze.

Lettie was working. Poor child, though she never murmured, she was evidently pining at George's long absence. Harry was leaning out of the window, studying the evening effect on the fruit blossom, which was wonderfully early and plentiful, the season was so mild. I was sitting at the table, near the lamp, reading the paper.

Suddenly there swept into the room a chill. It was not a gust of cold wind, for the curtain, by the open window, did not swerve in the least. But the deathly cold pervaded the room—came, and was gone in an instant. Lettie shuddered, as I did, with the intense icy feeling.

She looked up. "How curiously cold it has got all in a minute," she said.

"We are having a taste of poor George's Polar weather," I said, with a smile.

At the same moment I instinctively glanced toward his portrait. What I saw struck me dumb. A rush of blood as the throw heat dispelled the numbing influence of the chill breath that had seemed to freeze me.

I have said that the lamp was lighted; but it was only that I might read with comfort, for the violet twilight was still so full of sunset that the room was not dark. But as I looked at the picture I saw it had undergone a strange change. I saw it as plainly as possible. It was no delusion, coined for the eye by the brain.

I saw, in the place of George's head, a grinning skull! I stared at it hard, but it was no trick of fancy. I could see the hollow orbits, the gleaming teeth, the fleshless cheek bones—it was the head of death!

Without saying a word, I rose from my chair, and walked straight up to the painting. As I drew nearer, a sort of mist seemed to pass before it; and as I stood close to it, I saw only the face of George. The spectral skull had vanished.

"Poor George!" I said, unconsciously.

Lettie looked up. The tone of my voice had alarmed her, the expression of my face did not reassure her.

"What do you mean? Have you heard anything? Oh, Robert, in mercy tell me!"

She got up, and came over to me, and laying her hands on my arm, looked up into my face, imploringly.

"No, my dear; how should I hear? Only I could not help thinking of the privation and discomfort he must have gone through. I was reminded of it by the cold."

"Cold!" said Harry, who had left the window by this time. "Cold! what on earth are you talking about? Cold, such an evening as this! You must have had a touch of the ague, I should think."

"Both Lettie and I felt it bitterly cold a minute or two ago. Did not you feel it?"

"Not a bit; and as I was three parts out of the window, I ought to have felt it, if any one did."

It was curious, but that strange chill had been felt only in the room. It was not the night wind, but some supernatural breath connected with the dread apparition I had seen. It was, indeed, the chill of polar Winter—the icy shadow of the frozen North.

"What is the day of the month, Harry?" I asked.

"To-day—the 23d, I think," he answered; then added, taking up the newspaper I had been reading, "Yes, here you are. Tuesday, February the 23d, if the Daily News tells the truth, which I suppose it does. Newspapers can afford to tell the truth about dates, whatever they may do about art." Harry had been rather roughly handled by the critic of a morning paper for one of his pictures a few days before, and he was a little angry with journalism generally.

Presently, Lettie left the room, and I told Harry what I had felt and seen, and told him to take note of the date, for I feared that some mischance had befallen George.

"I'll put it down in my pocket-book, Bob. But you and Lettie must have had a touch of the cold shivers, and your stomach or fancy misled you—they're the same thing, you know. Besides, as regards the picture, there's nothing in that! There is a skull there, of course. As TENNYSON says:

"'Age face, however full,
Padded round with flesh and fat,
Is but modelled on a skull.'"

The skull's there—just as in every good figure subject the nude is there under the costumes. You fancy that is a mere coat of paint. Nothing of the kind! Art lives, Sir! That is just as much a real head as yours is with all the muscles and bones, just the same. That's what makes the difference between art and rubbish."

This was a favorite theory of Harry's, who had not yet developed from the dreamer into the worker. As I did not care to argue with him, I allowed the subject to drop, after we had written down the date in our pocket books. Lettie came down word presently that she did not feel well, and had gone to bed. My wife came down presently, and asked what had happened. She had been up with the children, and had gone in to see what was the matter with Lettie.

"I think it was very imprudent to sit with the window open, dear. I knew the nights are warm, but the night air strikes cold at times—at any rate, Lettie seems to have caught a violent cold, for she is shivering very much. I am afraid she has got a chill from the open windows."

I did not say anything to her then, except that both Lettie and I had felt a sudden coldness, for I did not care to enter into an explanation again, for I could see Harry was inclined to laugh at me for being so superstitious.

At night, however, in our own room, I told my wife what had occurred, and what my apprehensions were. She was so upset and alarmed that I almost repented having done so.

The next morning Lettie was better again, and as we did not either of us refer to the events of the preceding night, the circumstance appeared to be forgotten by us all.

But, from that day, I was ever inwardly dreading the arrival of the news. And at last it came.

One morning, just as I was coming down stairs to breakfast, there came a knock at the door, such as only made the opportunity. It was a very early visitor, for he, for he usually used to spend his mornings at the studio, and drop in on his way home at night. He was looking pale and agitated.

"Lettie's not down, is she, yet?" he asked; and then, before I could answer, added another question, "What newspaper do you take?"

"The Daily News," I answered. "Why?"

"She's not down?"

"No."

"Thank God! Look here!"

He took a paper from his pocket, and gave it to me, pointing out a short paragraph at the bottom of one of the columns.

I knew what was coming the moment he spoke about Lettie.

The paragraph was headed, "Fatal Accident to one of the Officers of the Pioneer Expedition Ship." It stated that news had been received at the Admiralty, stating that the expedition had failed to find the missing news, but had come upon some traces of them. Want of stores and necessities had compelled them to turn back without following them farther. They had, however, made inquiries as often as they dared, but the natives were cautious as ever, and the only could be gathered, to go out and take up the trail where he left it. An unfortunate accident had deprived him of one of his most prominent officers, Lieutenant Mason, who was precipitated from an iceberg and killed while out shooting with the surgeon. He was beloved by all, and his death had flung a gloom over the gallant little troop of explorers.

"It's not in the News to-day, thank goodness, Bob," said Harry, who had been searching the paper while I was reading the one he brought—"but you must keep a sharp look out for some days, and not let Lettie see it when it appears, as it is certain to do, sooner or later."

Then we both of us looked at each other, with tears in our eyes. "Poor George!—poor Lettie!" was signed, softly.

"But she must know it, and at some time or other!" I said, despairingly.

"I suppose so," said Harry, "but it would kill her to come on it suddenly, like this. Where's your wife?"

She was with the children, but I sent up for her and told her the ill tidings.

She had a hard struggle to conceal her emotion for Lettie's sake. But the tears would flow, in spite of her efforts.

"How shall I ever find courage to tell her?" she asked.

"Hush!" said George, suddenly grasping her arm, and looking toward the door.

I turned. There stood Lettie, with her face pale as death, with her lips apart, and with a blind look about her eyes. She had come in without disturbing her. We never learnt how much of the story she had overheard; but it was enough to tell her the worst. We all sprang toward her; but she only waved us away, turned round, and went up stairs again, without saying a word. My wife hastened up after her, and found her on her knees by the bed, insensible.

The doctor was sent for, and restoratives were promptly administered. She came to herself again, but lay dangerously ill for some weeks from the shock.

It was about a month after she was well enough to come down stairs again that I saw in the paper an announcement of the arrival of the Pioneer. The news had no interest for any of us now, so I said nothing about it. The mere mention of the vessel's name would have caused the poor girl pain.

One afternoon, shortly after this, as I was writing at home, there came a loud knock at the front door. I looked up from my writing and listened, for the voice which inquired if I was in sounded strange but not yet quite together unfamiliar. As I looked up, musing whose it could be, my eye rested accidentally upon poor George's portrait. Was I dreaming or awake?

I have told you that the one hand was resting on a sword. I could see now distinctly that the forefinger was raised, as if in warning. I looked at it hard to assure myself it was no fancy, and then I perceived, standing out bright and distinct on the pale face, two large drops, as if of blood.

I walked up to it, expecting the appearance to vanish, as the skull had done. It did not vanish, but the uplifted finger resolved itself into a little white moth, which had settled on the canvas. The red drops were fluid, and certainly not blood, though I was at a loss, for the time, to account for them.

The moth seemed to be in a torpid state, so I took it off the picture, and placed it under an inverted wineglass on the mantelpiece. All this took less time to do it than to describe. As I turned from the mantelpiece, the servant brought in a card, saying the gentleman was waiting in the hall to know if I would see him.

On the card was the name of "Vincent Grieve, of the exploring vessel Pioneer."

"Thank heaven, Lettie is out," thought I; and then added, aloud, to the servant: "Show him in here; and, Jane, if your mistress and Miss Lettie come in before the gentleman goes, tell them I have some the with me on business, and do not wish to be disturbed."

I went to the door to meet Grieve. As he crossed the threshold, and before he could have seen the portrait, he stopped, shuddered and turned white, even to his thin lips.

"Cover that picture before I come in," he said, hurriedly, in a low voice. "You remember the effect it had upon me. Now, with the memory of poor Mason, it would be worse than ever."

I could understand his feelings better now than at first, for I had come to look on the picture with some awe myself. So I took the cloth off a little round table that stood under the window and hung it over the portrait.

When I had done so Grieve came in. He was greatly altered. He was thinner and paler than ever; hollow-eyed and hollow-cheeked. He had acquired a strange stare, too, and his eyes had lost the crafty look for a look of terror, like that of a hunted beast. I noticed that he kept glancing sideways every instant, as if unconsciously. It looked as if he heard some one behind him.

I had never liked the man; but now I felt an insurmountable repugnance to him—so great a repugnance that, when I came to think of it, I felt pleased that the incident of covering the picture, at his request, had led to my not shaking hands with him.

I felt that I could not speak otherwise than coldly to him; indeed, I had to speak with painful plainness.

I told him that, of course, I was glad to see him back, but that I could not ask him to continue to visit us. I should be glad to hear the particulars of poor George's death; but that I could not let him see my sister, and hinted, as delicately as I could, of the impropriety of which he had been guilty when he last visited.

He took it all very quietly, only giving a long, weary sigh when I told him I must beg him not to repeat his visit. He looked so weak and ill, that I was obliged to ask him to take a glass of wine—an offer which he seemed to accept with great pleasure.

I got out the sherry and biscuits, and placed them on the table between us, and he took a glass and drank it off greedily.

It was not without some difficulty that I could get him to tell me of George's death. He related, with evident reluctance, how they had gone out to shoot a white bear, which they had seen on an iceberg stranded along the shore. The top of the berg was ridged like the roof of a house, sloping down on one side, to the edge of a tremendous overhanging precipice. They had scrambled along the ridge in order to get nearer the game, when George incautiously ventured on the sloping side.

"I called out to him," said Grieve, "and begged him to come back, but too late. The surface was as smooth and slippery as glass. He tried to turn back, but slipped and fell. And then began a horrible scene. Slowly, slowly, but with ever-increasing motion, he began to slide down toward the edge. There was nothing to grasp at—no irregularity or projection on the smooth face of the ice. I tore off my coat and hastily attaching it to the stock of my gun, pushed the latter toward him; but it did not reach far enough. Before I could lengthen it, by tying my cravat to it, he had slid yet further away, and more quickly. I shouted to him to be ready; but there was no one within hearing. He, too, saw his fate was sealed; and he could only tell me to bring his last farewell to you, and—to her. Then Grieve's voice broke, and it was all over! He clung to the edge of the precipice instinctively for one second, and was gone!"

Just as Grieve uttered the last word his jaw fell; his eyeballs seemed ready to start from his head; he sprang to his feet, pointed at something behind me, and then, flinging up his arms, fell with a scream, as if he had been shot. He was seized with an epileptic fit.

I instinctively looked behind me as I hurried to raise him on the floor. The cloth had fallen from the picture, where the face of George, made pale by the cover by the sunset of a dreary day, looked out upon us.

I brought the half-recovered surgeon home in a hackney coach, and had to tell him what we had seen. He was very kind and attentive to me, and assisted me in putting poor Grieve to bed. He, of course, I selected the following up again.

When he was quite himself again, Grieve told me he was subject to such fits occasionally.

He seemed very anxious to leave if he had said or done anything extraordinary while he was in the fit, and expressed relief when I said he had not. He apologized for the trouble he had given, and insisted on his he was strong enough he would take his leave. He was leaning on the mantelpiece as he said this. The little white moth caught his eye.

"So you have had some one else from the Pioneer here before me?" he said, nervously.

I answered in the negative, asking what made him think so.

"Why, this little white moth is never found in such southern latitudes. It is one of the last signs of life northward. Where did you get it?"

"I caught it here in this room," I answered.

"That is very strange. I never heard of such a thing before. We shall hear of showers of blood soon. I should not wonder."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Oh, these little fellows emit little drops of a red-looking fluid at certain seasons, and sometimes so plentifully that the superstitious think it is a shower of blood. I have seen the snow quite stained in places. Take care of it; it is a rarity in the South."

I noticed, after he left, which he did almost immediately, that there was a drop of red fluid on the marble under the wineglass. The blood stain on the picture was accounted for; but how came the moth here?

And there was another strange thing about the man, which I had scarcely been able to assure myself of in the room, where there were gas-lights, but about which there was no possible mistake, when I saw him walking away up the street.

"Harry! here—quick!" I called to my brother, who at once came to the window. "You're an artist, tell me, is there anything strange about that man?"

"No; nothing that I can see," said Harry, but then suddenly, in an altered tone, added, "Yes, there is. By Jove, he has a double shadow!"

That was the explanation of his sidelong glances, of the habitual stoop. There was a something always at his side, which none could see, but which cast a shadow.

He turned, presently, and saw us at the window. Instantly, he crossed the road to the shady side of the street. I told Harry all that had passed, and we agreed that it would be as well not to say a word to Lettie.

Two days later, when I returned from a visit to Harry's studio, I found the whole house in confusion.

I learnt from Lettie that while my wife was up stairs, Grieve had called, had not waited for the servant to announce him, but had walked straight into the dining room, where Lettie was sitting. She noticed that he avoided looking at the picture, and, to make sure of not seeing it, had seated himself on the sofa, just beneath it. He had then, in spite of Lettie's angry remonstrances, renewed his offer of love, strengthening it finally by assuring her that poor George, with his dying breath, had implored him to seek her, and watch over her, and marry her.

"I was so indignant, I hardly knew how to answer him," said Lettie. "When, suddenly, just as he uttered the last words, there came a twang like the breaking of a guitar—and—I hardly know how to describe it—but the portrait had fallen, and the corner of the heavy frame had struck him on the head, cutting it open, and rendering him insensible."

They had carried him up stairs, by the directions of the doctor, for whom my wife at once sent on hearing what had occurred. He was laid on the couch in my dressing room, where I went to see him. I intended to reproach him for coming to the house, despite my prohibition, but I found him delirious. The doctor said it was a queer case; Lettie, though the blow was a severe one, it was hardly enough to account for the symptoms of brain fever. When she learnt that Grieve had, but just returned in the Pioneer from the North, he said it was possible that the privation and hardship had told on his constitution, and sown the seeds of the malady.

We sent for a nurse, who was to sit up with him, by the doctor's directions.

The rest of the story is soon told. In the middle of the night I was roused by a loud scream. I slipped on my clothes and rushed out, to find the nurse, with Lettie in her arms, in a faint. We carried her into her room, and then the nurse explained the mystery to us.

It appears that about midnight Grieve sat up in bed and began to talk. And he said such dreadful things that the nurse became alarmed. Nor was she much reassured when she became aware that the light of her single candle flung what seemed to be two shadows of the sick man on the wall.

Terrified beyond measure, she had crept into Lettie's room and confided her fears to her; and Lettie, who was a courageous and kindly girl, dressed herself and said she would sit with her. She, too, saw the double shadow—but what she heard was far more terrible.

Grieve was sitting up in bed, gazing at the unseen figure to which the shadow belonged. In a voice that trembled with emotion he begged the haunting spirit to leave him, and prayed its forgiveness.

"You know the crime was not premeditated. It was a sudden temptation of the devil that made me strike the blow, and fling you over the precipice. It was the devil tempting me with the recollection of her exquisite face—of the tender love that might have been mine but for you. But she will not listen to me. See, she turns away from me, as if she knew I was your murderer, George Mason!"

It was Lettie who repeated in a horrified whisper this awful confession.

I could see it all now. As I was about to tell Lettie of the many strange things I had concealed from her, the nurse, who had gone to see her patient, came running back in alarm.

Vincent Grieve had disappeared. He had risen in his delirious terror, had opened the window and leaped out. Two days later his body was found in the river.

A curtain hangs now before poor George's portrait, though it is no longer connected with any supernatural marvels; and never, since the night of Vincent Grieve's death, have we seen aught of that most mysterious haunting presence—the Shadow of a Shade.

LORD CHESTERFIELD TRYING TO TEACH HIS SON.—It is the most curious situation, humorous, touching, laughable. Out of the clouds and darkness appears the one man talking eagerly, straining his eyes, straining all his faculties, employing all the resources of infinite skill and patience to touch and influence the other; and that other opposing a dead silence, and heavy acquiescence, a passive resistance to all this vehemence, eagerness and passion. The poor fellow's brain must have got confused with the eloquence poured forth upon him, the keen pricks of ridicule, the instructions which can't nothing, and leave nothing to private judgment. The spectator weeps a tear of blood for the father, thus staking all upon one throw; but there is also a certain pity in his mind for the boy. What effect could such perpetual stimulants have upon a tame nature incapable of any sovereign impulse? PHILIP STANHOPE must have listened with weariness, with dull struggles of impatience, with a growing bewilderment—he must have sought refuge in silence, in obscurity and concealment. No doubt he felt with the infallible certainty of self-consciousness that he was not a man who could ever fill up the ideal set before him. The desire of his soul must have been to be let alone.—Mrs. Oliphant, "Historical Sketches of the Reign of George II."

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE TOBACCO QUESTION.—It is useless to dwell upon the other argument of anti-tobacconists, that there is enough nicotine in every pure cigar to kill a man outright. By the same process of reasoning we might say that in half a pound of almonds there is sufficient prussic acid to destroy a troop of soldiers; and that, with the saffron that could be extracted from six bath buns, a whole nursery full of children might be sent to their graves. It is one thing to swallow the distilled quintessence of a substance containing a small quantity of poison, and it is another to take that poison mixed up with certain matters which counteract its effects and absorb its noxious properties. The moderate use of good tobacco involves no danger. On the contrary, in cases of nervous excitement, it is excellent as a sedative; it is excellent, also, as a remedy for sleeplessness; and its soothing qualities render it an invaluable solace for students, who, like authors and painters, live in a state of constant mental excitement. Cigars.

The Salian, ABUBAKIN IV., who condemned snuff taken to death; the Shah of Persia, ABBAS, who cut off their noses; INNOCENT VIII., who excommunicated them; JAMES I., who wrote an absurd book against them; were all equally in the wrong. The remarks, that apply to smokers apply to those who take snuff. Our grandfathers took snuff every day of their lives from twenty to ninety, without being the worse for it. All the great men of the last century indulged in this harmless—though, it must be owned, dirty—habit. Nareomow L., not to have the trouble of opening a snuff-box every five minutes, used, when out campaigning, to keep both waistcoat pockets continually filled with a pot mixture of his own. To those who still maintain, in the face of such facts, that tobacco is hurtful, we have only to answer, as VOLTAIRE answered, when, after taking coffee all his life, he was told by anyone that the beverage was a poison—"Perhaps, he said; but in that case a very slow one."—All the Year Round.

MY LOVE OF LONG AGO.

The rose has fled from thy cheek,
And furrow'd is thy brow;
Thy sparkling eyes, that seemed to speak,
Are dull and heavy now.
The locks on thy beloved head,
That late were like to golden threes,
Are white as Winter snow;
Yet is my love for thee not dead,
My love of long ago.

I, too, am old, but as thy voice
I burn with youthful fire;
Its music makes my heart rejoice,
And throb with fierce desire.
Its tones seem echoes of the time
When we were both in life's glad prime,—
Sweet sounds, though faint and low,
Like some far-distant wedding chime,—
My love of long ago.

SHAMROCKIANA.

From the Cornhill Magazine, December.

BAGENAL, of Bagenalstown, who made the tour of Europe in a series of adventures of love, dueling and play; "Buck" WHALLEY, who, in an after-dinner wager, backed himself to walk to Jerusalem for £10,000, and won his bet, are still remembered by some yet alive. The whole island, however, displayed a kind of barbaric splendor in retinue and style of living, and men vied with each other in every species of extravagance. These habits, be it remembered, were maintained by men many of whom brought to society considerable acquirement and great polish of manner. They were not, therefore, mere orgies of coarse debauchery; they were really examples of a very high conviviality, disfigured, it is true, by occasional excess, and not infrequently suggesting serious altercations. "What are you doing?" said a Galway gentleman to his friend, as he saw him fencing against the wall of his house. "I've a dinner party of friends to-day," was the answer, "and I'm getting my sword hand into practice." Sir JONAH BARRINGTON gives some very curious details of these days and the men who figured in them. In his catalogue of duelling we find Judges, Chief Barons, Masters in Chancery and a Provost of Trinity College! The causes of quarrel were generally political, and as generally the result of some wordy altercation in the House. He enumerates these with a most painstaking accuracy until he comes to the case of two great dignitaries of the Bar, who fought with sword and pistol, he says, having quarrelled on "miscellaneous subjects."

It was, indeed, a strange and most incomprehensible period, wherein the highest culture warred with the most reckless disregard of life and fortune, and when men vacillated between the observances of a splendid chivalry and habits but little removed from barbarism. What was the condition of the peasantry all this time? Serfdom, the most abject and degrading. Their miserable holdings were at will, everything, even to their very lives, dependent upon the pleasure of their landlord. Rack rented, outraged and despised, they yet clung to their country with a devotion that seemed inalienable. Indeed, they seemed to take a pride and feel a pleasure in the very aspect of that libertine life their masters led, and experienced something like self-exaltation in the splendor of their chieftain. Add to these elements the envious discords of race and religion, the jarring influences of rival factions, and you will own that from a society so constituted, fiction need not have gone far to select materials for its purpose.

There was in Dublin a coffee house called "Lucas"—it stood where the Exchange now stands—the favorite resort of all those whose whims and eccentricities gave them a fashionable notoriety. These were distinctively called Bucks, a class, it must be owned, which conferred little credit on the rank they pertained to. One of the maxims of the period was that no gentleman had really taken his proper station in society till he had fought at least one duel. "Did he blaze?" was the significant question put when any new candidate was proposed for a club or a coterie. The ambitious politician, the aspiring man of fashion, the young barrister, all saw their readiest way to preferment by the pistol. Of Lord NORBURY it was said that he "shot up" to the highest walk in his profession; and we hear that HENRY GRATTAN himself summed up the whole wisdom of worldly success in the advice, "Be always ready with the pistol."

The most extraordinary feature of all this is, that society seemed really untouched by the savagery of these habits, and the very men most conscious for these practices were known in the world as peculiarly good-natured and easy in disposition. I own that this sounds a little paradoxical; but what is not so when we talk of Ireland and Irishmen? The duel had actually taken that place in the custom of the country that hostile meetings attracted little attention at the time they occurred, and rarely imparted any lasting bitterness between the combatants afterward.

There was a cool indifference to life, an easy jocularity throughout these proceedings, that assuredly reads very strangely to modern ears. It was Sir BOYLE ROACH, I believe, who, being interrupted several times by outbursts of affected coughing, took a handful of pistol bullets from his pocket, and holding them out, said, "These are infallible pills for a cough, if any gentleman will try them." And this in the House of Commons, remember!

There were dueling clubs, which assumed to legislate for every casuality and incident of the "duelle," and whose appeal was final in every case submitted to them; but what shall we say to the fact that there were also abduction clubs, formally established for forcibly carrying off heiresses, the members binding themselves by an oath to assist in any enterprise fixed upon by a brother of the order? No criminality was attached to this mode of courtship by public opinion; on the contrary, there was a character of heroism about it that was deemed to reflect credit on the man and impute irresistible attraction to the lady. If any untoward event—the death, for instance, of any one resisting the attempt—occurred, it was deemed a very trivial offence, and a natural consequence of their ill-advised opposition. The law, at that period, made abduction a capital felony, and the heavy penalty served to dignify the crime in Irish eyes, and exalt the daring incapidity of him who conceived it. Some of the incidents which took place in this way were of the most romantic kind, exhibiting every character of sentiment and emotion which could render narrative intensely interesting.

Among the vices of the time excessive drinking prevailed to a fearful extent. It grew, in a measure, out of that exaggerated notion of hospitality which deemed debauch to be a duty. We are told that if a guest on any occasion left the room, bits of paper were dropped in his glass, intimating the number of rounds the bottle had gone in his absence.

This habit prevailed in the very highest circles of society—in the Court of the Viceroy, in the mansions of the nobility; the gravest dignatories of the law were addicted to it, and it is even said, were seen inebriated on the Bench. Sir JONAH BARRINGTON tells us that near to the Kennel of his father's hounds was built a small hovel, to which a hogshead of claret was rolled, while a newly-killed heifer was hung up against the wall; an adjoining room was provided with straw for such of the guests as were disposed to sleep; and here nine gentlemen met on a frosty day of Winter, accompanied by two keepers and some couples of hounds, to ask their mellow voices to the convivial chorus. The orgie lasted seven days; in fact, till both claret and cow were finished—the last gallon of the liquor being mixed with spices and drank in tumblers to "their next merry meeting."

THE VOICE.—Nothing betrays so much as the voice, save perhaps the eyes, and they can be lowered, and so far their expression hidden. In moments of emotion no skill can hide the fact of disturbed feeling, though a strong will and the habit of self-control can steady the voice when else it would be faltering and tremulous. But not the strongest will, nor the largest amount of self-control, can keep it natural as well as steady. It is deadened, veiled, compressed, like a wild creature tightly dozed and unnaturally still. One feels that it is done by an effort, and that if the strain were relaxed for a moment the wild creature would burst loose in rage or despair, and the voice would break out into the scream of passion, or quiver away into the falter of pathos. And this very effort is as eloquent as if there had been no holding down at all, and the voice had been left to its own impulse unchecked. Again, is not and manner, is it not the voice that is expressive, even more than the face? The twinkle of the eye, the hollow in the under lip, the dimples about the mouth, the play of the eyebrow, are all aids certainly; but the voice! The mellow tone that comes into the utterance of one man, the surprised accents of another, the fatuous simplicity of a third, the philosophical acquiescence of a fourth when relating the most outrageous impossibilities—a voice and manner peculiarly transcendental, and, indeed, one of the Yankee forms of fun—do not we know all these varieties by heart?—have we not veteran actors whose main point lies in one or other of these varieties? and what would be the dreriest anecdote if told in a voice which had neither play nor significance? Pathos, too—who feels it, however beautifully expressed so far as words may go, if uttered in a dead and wooden voice without sympathy? But the poorest attempts at pathos will strike home to the heart if given tenderly and harmoniously; and just as certain popular airs of mean association can be made into church music by slow time and stately modulation, so can dead-level literature be lifted into passion or softened into sentiment by the voice alone.

We all know the effect, irritating or soothing, which certain voices have over us; and we have all experienced that strange impulse of attraction or repulsion which comes from the sound of the voice alone. And, generally, if not absolutely always, the impulse is a true one, and any modification which increased knowledge may produce is never quite satisfactory. Certain voices grate on our nerves, and set our teeth on edge, and others are just as calming as these are irritating, quieting us like a composing draught, and setting vague images of beauty and pleasantness afloat in our brains. A good voice, calm in tone and musical in quality, is one of the essentials for a physician—the "bedside voice," which is nothing if it is not sympathetic by constitution. Not false, not made up, not sickly, but tender in itself, of a rather low pitch, well modulated, and distinctly harmonious in its notes, it is the very opposite of the orator's voice, which is artificial in its management and a made voice.—Saturday Review.

THE WONDERS OF THE DEEP.—That story of deep-sea dredging is a wonderful story. It was told out at the Royal Society last week. We heard the accounts of what had been done by Her Majesty's steamship Porcupine, Captain CALVER, Royal Navy, between May and September last. Here I can find room for only two or three facts. At one point Mr. GWYN JEFFREYS, in whose scientific charge the vessel was, dredged at the depth of 2,435 fathoms—nearly the heighth of Mont Blanc—and sometimes brought up 1½ cwt. of mud from the bottom of the ocean. In those abysses is "an extraordinary abundance of animal life." Animals of high organization, and with the perfect eyes, have come up. A great number of entirely new specimens have been obtained. One haul brought up 20,000 of a single form of echinus. Here are materials for thought. But I have mentioned a small part only of the wonders detailed that night. To the instinctive question, what is the use of eyes down in that profound darkness, Sir CHARLES LYELL suggests the answer that the creatures may have a phosphorescent habitat. They have lamps, in fact. Truly, if the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty, those of the sea are full of the habitations of supernatural kindness.—Shirley Brooks, in the Illustrated London News.

TEACHING CHILDREN.—In the nursery, too, must begin the culture of the mind. Even toys may be made the means of conveying right ideas of form, a correct notion of and a taste for color, and a knowledge of the elements of all learning. No nursery should be without its box of large, carefully-printed letters on blocks of wood, with which the elder children will soon teach the last newcomer its alphabet—indeed, long before one would suppose that it is capable of acquiring it. A box of geometrical bricks of wood will give a child an early notion of forms, such as the circle, triangle and square, and the combinations that may be formed by putting together several regular angular figures such as the two last named. Good pictures of common objects and incidents in every-day life, and illustrations of the more striking Bible stories, should be found on the walls of every nursery, and a card exhibiting primary tints, and their secondary and tertiary combinations, and if the last can be procured in the form of a strong and durable dissected puzzle, view of the danger incurred by them through reasons of the cats which rendered all access to the tower dangerous for them; and his request was that the point gained an additional postponement. Dr THOU, to whom we are indebted for these curious details, does not state in the conclusion of the trial, but it is fair to presume that the rats were finally condemned and duly exommunicated, in spite of the learning and ability of their advocate, for then was the usual result in these cases, and CHASSANEUX in his consultation had admitted its propriety.—From "Studies in Church History," by Henry C. Lea.

DOUBTS RESOLVED.

Through the dether-sprinkled glory
Of the pearly dawn of Night,
While I prayed and mused my story
Ended with Day's parting light.
Suddenly a sense of beauty
Bloomed upon my aching sight,
And a solemn stillness bound me—
'Neath the stary mute throbbings bright;
Till a whisper breath'd around me—
Whisper of the Infinite—
"Hush!" it breathed. "'tis not thy duty
God's great purpose to indict;
He can light the darkest features,
All her shadowed thoughts efface;
Souls fore-doom'd by doom's harsh preachers
Gift with Seraphs' beaming grace;
He hath room for all His creatures
In the storehouse of the spheres—
He whose rain drops are more countless
Than the rain of human tears;
Stores of wealth hath numberless
To unloose all human fears;
Think ye He for ill created
Aught His boundless love may bless?
Doom ye man whe hates is hated
By his Maker? 'Tis the guess
Of blinded nothingness
Creeping in Folly's wilderness—
It is our faithless frenzy to confess,
Which Heav'n might not forgive, if Heav'n were less.

THE LAST OF THE STUARTS.

From All the Year Round.

The world is full of pretenders. We are all pretenders, more or less. But it is not of such pretenders as these that I write—nor of real pretenders to thrones, which they or their ancestors have rightfully or wrongfully forfeited; but of the sham pretenders to great historical names, that in all ages, and in all countries, start up, whenever a great heritage is mysteriously vacant, or an ancient family has no accredited representative. Do these pretenders in any case believe in their own claims? Or are they all swindlers and adventurers? For instance, did all or any of the half dozen people, French, German, American and English, who within the last sixty or seventy years have pretended to be Louis XVII., the poor child who perished in prison under the brutal treatment of the cobbler who had charge of him, really believe himself to be what he asserted? Were they all impostors—AUGUSTUS MEYES in England, Rev. ELEAZER WRIGHT in America, and all the rest of them—impostors knowing themselves to be such? Or did one or more act upon the honest conviction that he really was the person he represented himself to be? Did all the handsome young fellows in Highland garb, assuming to be lineal and legitimate descendants of King JAMES II., of England, and JAMES VII., of Scotland, believe in their royal pedigree; or did they play the part to get money out of it and gain consideration by it, or out of the love of hoaxing; or because in life they really knew no other part they could play so well? Without venturing to assert that not one of the many claimants to be the real Louis XVII., or the legitimate representative of Prince CHARLES EDWARD STUART, may have been a true man, it may without want of kindly charity be admitted, that those among them who were not rogues must have been more or less fools: in other words crazy. Perhaps this is the simple explanation of the fact that so many of such characters have appeared. Madness often takes this form.

It happened that five or six years ago I made the acquaintance of a remarkable old gentleman, or rather, the remarkable old gentleman made my acquaintance, and confided to me the secret of his birth, parentage, education and very modest pretensions. He was a very high personage, according to his story; but did not aim at high fortune, or at anything, in fact, except to be let alone. I was at the time temporarily resident in a great and populous city of the New World, which its inhabitants call Gotham, and which I shall call Gotham here. What took me to Gotham I need not tell. Suffice it to say that I was very well known in the City, and had the annoyance—perhaps, if all the truth were known, it was the honor—of being often and very unjustly attacked in the columns of more than one of the Gothamite journals. In short, I was for the time being the best abused Englishman in Gotham; and my name and business were familiar to thousands of people of whom I knew nothing nor cared to know anything. It was a hot, a very hot, day in July, when there walked into my office, entirely unannounced, a venerable gentleman with long white hair, and a countenance as full of dignity and nobility of expression that it instantly drew my attention anywhere. He was very careful to shut the door behind him, and seeing a young man in the room with me, he asked looking very suspiciously around him whether he could speak to me in private. It was a time when men's political passions were violently excited, and it especially behooved me to be on my guard, lest the Gothamite journals, in their attacks on me with pen and ink, should inspire some lunatic or some ruffian with the happy idea of attacking me with a revolver. But this man was so old and so pleasant looking that I had no other fear of him than that he had come to wheedle some dollars from my pocket. So I led him into my inner sanctum, and asked him to sit down, and tell me his name and business. He sat down, but not before making sure that the door was closed. I could not help gazing at him rather more earnestly than was quite consistent with good manners, by reason of his striking resemblance to the statue of CHARLES II., in Edinburgh, which had long been familiar to my memory, and of the very picturesque character of his noble head and forehead. He was clad in a suit of homespun blue; wore very thick soled shoes that did not appear to have been blackened for many a day, and had economically turned up the ends of his trousers, to prevent their contact with the mud. He carried a serviceable blackthorn stick in his hard hand: a hand that bore the undoubted marks of manual drudgery; he had a gold chain of antique fashion, hanging from the antique fob, now so seldom seen; and had altogether the air of a well-to-do farmer in a rough country, where people are accustomed to hard work, and are not particularly nice, either in dress or manners.

"My name," he said, "is of no consequence. My real name I do not care to call myself by—there's danger in it; but I am known to my neighbors as Mr.—— (let us say Blank.)

"Well, Mr. Blank, is there anything I can do for you?"

"Much," he replied; "but I must warn you, that to do me a service is to incur danger, very great danger; and you shall not incur it until you know who I am. Shall I tell you? Or are you afraid?"

"You may tell me; and I am not afraid," replied, beginning to feel additional interest in my mysterious visitor.

"I will go right into the matter at once," he said. "Look at me. I am the son of Charles Edward Stuart, who was lawful King of England, Scotland and Ireland, and was commonly and unjustly called the Pretender: a man who never pretended to be what he was not, or to the possession of anything but his own.

I certainly did start when Mr. Blank uttered these words; even if I did not rub my eyes to be quite certain that I was not asleep and dreaming. Being quite certain that I was awake, I looked incredulous, and replied:

"Surely, Mr. Blank, you cannot be the son of a man who died nearly eighty years ago?"

"Why not?" he inquired. "Besides, it is not nearly so long ago since my father died!"

"He died," I rejoined, "somewhere about the year 1788, being then, if my memory does not deceive me, about 68 years of age. He was born, I think, in 1720."

"He was," replied Mr. Blank; "you are quite right as to his birth, quite wrong as to his death. The truth is, he was the object of such persistent and cold-blooded persecution on the part of the British Government that a false story of his death was circulated in 1788, and he emigrated to the New World, in order to pass in peace the remainder (Mr. Blank, being an American, said, 'the balance') of such days as it might please Heaven to allot to him. He settled in the rude and thinly-peopled region of Western New-York, on the slope of the Adirondack Mountains, and purchased a farm which I now occupy. Shall I go on with my story?"

"By all means!"

"He was a hale and hearty man at that time, and remained hale and hearty for many years afterward; so hale and hearty, that in the year 1806, being then turned seventy-eight, and having lived in America ten years, he married a young woman of Scottish extraction; not very young, she was two and thirty at the time, and very beautiful. That marriage was a happy one. Three children, of whom I am the sole survivor, were born to my father before he died. He kept the secret. Even his wife did not know who he was, except that his real name was Stuart."

"And how did you come to know it, Mr. Stuart?" correcting myself, I said, "Mr. Blank?"

"By my father's will, bequeathing to me certain documents, by which I found all the proofs of the story I have told you."

"A very extraordinary story," said I.

"But not so extraordinary as true," added he very sharply and peremptorily.

"Do the documents exist?"

"They do."

"Will you show them to me?"

"Upon conditions," said he very slowly: "if your courage does not fail you when you know what the conditions are."

"Before we go further," said I, "will you tell me for what reason you have chosen me to be your confidant?"

"Because I am persecuted by the British Government as my father was before me. Because I have no joy in my life. Because I am beset by spies. Because I go in danger of poison or a shot from a revolver. Because I think that you have the means of causing all this persecution to cease."

"If—Really, Mr. Stuart, you overrate my importance. Supposing this persecution to be real, and not imaginary, I have no more power to help you than the man in the moon has. You say you have documents to prove your case. If so, I can only express my firm belief that if your documents be genuine, you have only to bring them to the notice of the British Government, and that Government, if persuaded that you are what you represent yourself to be, and as your documents, you say, will prove, will not only cease to persecute you—if ever they did persecute you—but, in consideration of your being the heir and representative of Charles Edward Stuart, will settle on you a very handsome pension."

The old gentleman shook his head. "I don't want a pension! I have a farm of my own, and am quite independent of any man's favor, much less the favor of any Government. I want nothing but to be let alone. Let me drink and eat without fear of poison; let me turn a corner without risk of a pistol or a bludgeon; let me sink down into the common herd of common men, and be at peace. That is all I ask; I want no pension, no money, no recognition, no anything, from anybody. Peace, and peace alone, that is all. And to you, Sir," he added, suddenly, "I owe an apology for having intruded upon you. It will be known in a week to the Court and Government of Queen Victoria that you have received and spoken to me. You will be a marked man, Sir, depend upon it, unless you go forthwith and denounce me. You may denounce me if you like; I give you full and free permission."

"That would be gross treachery, Mr. Stuart," replied I. "and I shall not denounce you. But if you have in your possession the documents you speak of, I should be glad to see them."

"You shall see them this day week," he said, "and without fail. Mind, I want nothing but to prove to you that I am what I say I am; and that when convinced of the fact, you will exercise your influence with the British Government to have me left in peace. You are about to say that you have no influence? I have my own opinions on that subject. You can say for me what I cannot say for myself—that I am no traitor, no intriguer, nothing but a poor, forlorn, last remnant of a once royal and powerful race, who asks nothing but a grave, and a quiet journey toward it."

Mr. Blank, true to his appointment, brought me the documents on the day he had fixed. The principal one was a certificate of marriage, purported to be duly signed and in all respects authentic, between Mr. Charles Edward Stuart, of the State of New-York, and a certain lady, of the same State, dated in October, 1798. Next to this was the certificate of baptism of Charles Edward Stuart, dated November, 1799; a third document purported to be a license from the State of New-York to Mr. Stuart, granting him, on payment of certain fees, the permission to be thenceforward known as Mr. Blank. There was nothing further of any consequence.

I suppose I looked dissatisfied. At all events, I said to Mr. Stuart that I had no doubt his father was married at the time specified, and that his name was Charles Edward Stuart.

"Well?" he inquired, somewhat triumphantly.

"Well," I replied, not at all triumphantly, "but what of that? I, myself, have known two people named Charles Edward Stuart, and neither of them claimed descent from the Royal family on that account."

"Of course not," said Mr. Blank, "they would have been impostors if they had, because they would have usurped a position that belongs to me only. There may be a thousand Charles Edward Stuarts in the world, for that matter; but there is only one of them the descendant of kings, and that is the man who stands before you."

"But Mr. Stuart, or Mr. Blank," I replied, "there is one link wanting in your golden chain, and that is a very important one. The link which proves your father to be the son of James the Second, so called, the man who fought and lost the battle of Culloden."

"Incredulous as St. Thomas!" he exclaimed; and then folding up his papers suddenly, and putting them carefully into an old and well-worn pocketbook, he added: "I have lost my time, and you have lost yours. I beg pardon for having intruded myself upon you. You are well quit of me. Had you believed my claim, and had you taken any steps in my behalf with the usurping Government of the day, you Gerard Iaidie that came from Hanover to sit in the seat of better men than himself, you might have been a ruined, and you certainly would have been a marked, man. You have had a narrow escape. Good morning."

He was gone before I could say a word to detain him. When I went to the door to make an effort to bring him back and put him in a better humor, I heard his heavy step on the stairs, and the slump of his thick cudgel as he descended. I never saw or heard of him more.

I have often wondered what put the notion into this old gentleman's head; whether he were crazed on that score and on no other; and whether his undoubted resemblance to the published portraits of Charles II. and the remarkable profile on the crown pieces of that reign, added to the strange coincidence afforded by his name, first gave him the idea, which was to color the whole course of his life, and infuse the little drop of poisonous gall into a cup of experience, that might otherwise have been sweet. I think he believed his own story. And it is just possible that as much may be said for a great many other pretenders of past and present times, who have gone through life burdened with a heavy delusion, and meaning no harm.

LORD PALMERSTON AND THE REPORTERS.—To the reporters of his public speeches he was always kind and considerate. One active gentleman, note-book in hand, had pursued him on a particular occasion, hoping to find busy employment for his stylus, and would have been disappointed but for the special good nature of his patron. There were to be great doings at the presentation of colors to a yeomanry corps, and Lord PALMERSTON having promised to give the affair his countenance, it was expected that he would give it also his voice, and make a speech, worth some pains in the taking down. To this end a practical professor of stenography, as I have said, followed to the field the noble Lord, and put himself in readiness for action. But the presentation of colors went off gaily enough without speech-making, and when the ceremony was over, Lord PALMERSTON buttoned his overcoat, and prepared, like the rest of the spectators, to depart. It was an awful moment. The desperate journalist went straightway to the great political Lord, and said imploringly:

"Is—— your Lordship going to make a speech?"

"Why, no," said his Lordship slowly; "I don't see that there's anything one can talk about." And then, turning suddenly to the reporter, he added the short encouraging question: "Do you?"

Upon which the gentleman with the note-book spake thus:

"Oh, yes, my Lord; I'm sure your Lordship could easily find something to say that would look well in the papers. Do, now, my Lord, let me hint it! may be it of you am a good layer. Just half a column, or thereabouts."

"Very well, very well," said the accommodating Premier; and, advancing to the front of the little stage that had been erected for the beauty and fashion of the neighborhood, he bowed to address the crowd, who had turned to go, and who now turned again to listen.

"I cannot let his occasion pass away," his Lordship began, "without trespassing a little on your time and patience for a few remarks," &c., &c.

Whatever the subject was, Lord PALMERSTON treated it in a speech so vivacious that nobody contracted with its length, although it was five or six times as long as "half a column of thereabouts." The fact, moreover, stands on record, that that same speech was so remarkable an exposition of something or other, that every newspaper in England commented on it in its leading article, and it was the talk of clubs, coteries and coffee rooms for the full nine days which make up the life of a wonder.—From "Fraser's Magazine."

The defective state of the Manx (France) criminal code has just led to a miscarriage of justice. The woman was accused of having tried to murder her husband by slowly poisoning him; but, although the evidence against her was almost overwhelming, the prosecution had to be withdrawn, as there is no provision under the Manx criminal code for the punishment of a person charged with attempting to murder by poison.

A Mr. S. B. PHILLIPS has in hand a Dictionary of Biographical Reference, which will comprise a compendious biographical dictionary or list of more than 40,000 names, each of which is to be given in its original spelling, accompanied by a designation of the kind of labor of each individual, the dates of his or her birth and death, and an indication of the sources in biographical works where the life may be studied.

Two witnesses, named respectively HUNT and SMITH, were examined before the Norwich Election Commissioners. HUNT said he gave money to voters at the last election, but he was drunk at the time and did not know what he was about. SMITH refused to testify to anything except that he "began to lose his recollection about 12 o'clock." Of course there was no examination possible after that statement.

In the old Churchyard of Worth, Dorsetshire, England, is a tomb with the following inscription: "BENJAMIN JESTY, of Downsway, born at Yetminster, and was an upright, honest man, particularly noted for having been the first person known that introduced the cow-pox by inoculation, and who, for his great strength of mind, made the experiment from the cow on his wife and two sons, in 1774."

A letter from GOETHE, dated 1797, was found lately in the house of the publisher VIEWEG, in Brunswick. It is addressed to the gentleman who was head of the firm at the time, and runs as follows: "I send you a manuscript in a sealed cover. If Herr Vieweg will and may give Freudstein d'or for it, he will have the goodness to return the packet without unsealing it." The publisher, it seems, took some days to consider the course he ought to pursue. At last he broke the seal. The manuscript turned out to be no less a work than the poem, "Hermann and Dorothea."

WINTER FASHIONS.

The Proper Out-Door Costumes—Street and Carriage, Theatre, The Fashionable Promenade for the Street, Opera and Theatre—Hats and Gloves.

Black cashmere suits are considered in more refined style than even velvet this Winter. The material is far finer than any quality known of late years, as may be judged from the cost, which is $3 to $7 a yard, six to eight quarters in width. These costumes are peculiarly French in style, the soft, lustrous folds with flutings and pleats (plaitings) of the same material, relieved only by dead silk passementerie ornaments, have that unobtrusive elegance dear to the soul of the French woman proper. You will see the Parisian lady of good birth walking the street in such gay colors as throng New-York streets on a Saturday afternoon. A jacket embroidered in colors, a bright green plush or blue velvet overdress, would stamp the wearer as not belonging to good society. The exquisite fashionable women you see in the modern French pictures such as BAUDENET and TOLLEMOUCHE love to paint, wear soft Nile-blue silks and mauve velvets, but they are always in carriage toilet, where color and trimming can be displayed properly at a distance. The strict modiste assigns the fashionable grave shades to street toilet, such as London smoke, Russian green, prune-purple, and chestnut with buckle, is soon to be left to second-rate people, as it is too pronounced for greatest style. The Gabrielle is a French hat little known, which shows the long plume and upturned sides without the peaked crown or cavalier air in general. Even the grebe hats lose their popularity and are voted clumsy looking beside the modest French shapes that make their appearance at New Year.

GLOVES.

Gloves are long wristed and the cuff finished by a scolloped volant, or slashed with white in Marguerite style, though the plain wrist on a slender shape to the hand and is really more elegant. Cedar berry, Egyptian gray, primrose, silver color, coral color, Nile green, and Havana are the shades for visiting and demi-dress. Ruby shades, lavender in blue, pink or stone shades, soft brown and tender coralline colors are preferred for morning. White gloves wrought with black, and black with gold, which will not tarnish, are among the novelties.

A CHINESE FUNERAL.

Curious Ceremonies Observed to the Good Effects of the Deceased so Appease the Malignant Deities.

From the San Francisco Bulletin, Dec. 4.

Three days since in this city, at his house on Jackson-street, died AH FOY, a Chinese merchant. The disease which baffled the skill of Chinese doctors and carried him off was a lingering consumption. He was born at Canton, and at an early age entered upon mercantile pursuits. He came to this country and continued his native avocation. He died at the age of 39 years. At first the exhibitions of sorrow were in private, by his nearest relatives and friends. The remains were placed in a metallic case for shipment to Canton—the only city in the world from which a Chinaman can property or safety ascend to the realm of spirits. It was determined that as the malignant deities had insinuated peculiar activity in procuring the death of the departed, prudent and extraordinary means should be taken to appease them or frighten them away, and at the same time to propitiate the good gods. The rooms in which the private exercises were held were too small, and the leaders of ceremonies obtained permission from Chief CROWLEY to occupy a portion of the sidewalk in front of the street for a public exhibition. Accordingly at an early hour yesterday, a man dressed in priestly robes came out of the house, holding in one hand a large ox horn. He applied it to his lips, and elevating his instrument, blew shrill and sharp to all points of the compass. This is supposed to have startled the evil ones into a comprehension of the fact that some demonstration was about to be made against them. After blowing the horn for several minutes the priest was succeeded by other men with bells, and these were joined by others with fifes and bass drums. There was more than the infernals could stand, and they retreated pell-mell in every direction. Some few down Jackson-street, some up the street, others into the adjacent alleys, and still others to the headquarters of the Anti-Coolie Society. While the bells were ringing, and only good gods were around in the air, the mourners came out in the street. Then the coffin was brought out and placed on the sidewalk, draped with red, white and green cloths. The mourners, of whom there were about half a dozen—all women, but one—were dressed in white robes, with white cowls on their heads. The hair on the women's heads was shaved. Several of them wept in a genuine manner, but the rest howled in such a way as to justify the statement made by some in attendance that they were hired mourners. When the coffin was put down the mourners rallied around it several times, weeping, wailing and throwing up their hands, and then all bowed themselves with their faces to the ground, and remained in that position several hours.

On the sidewalk, below the coffin, were ranged three or four wide tables, and on them were deposited the sacrificial offerings. There were five roasted hogs—full size—with tips of tinsel on their ears and wreathed about their snouts. Three sheep, skinned and laid on large pans, occupied prominent places. Then there were chickens roasted whole, with many-colored candles twisted around their legs and over them in imitation of spurs. They were set up in edible chairs, with their necks straightened, and fantastic covers placed on top of their heads. Their claws were bent up and made to grasp spears, darts and exercising wands. Several mourners had been hired all day long, and, as they sat on the benches on their wigs, the wattles on their necks and the crests on their heads were not even wilted. These, too, were ornamented with tinsel and paper. Several large crabs from Meiggs' wharf lay in the centre of the table, and were set off with ornaments like all the rest of the offerings. There were numerous pyramids of fruit also—apples, pears, grapes and nuts; pyramids of high-colored, greasy-looking cakes; four imitations of lambs, goats, ducks, &c., covered with melted confectionery; piles of Josh sticks and sacred papers, with rows of them burning, smoking and spluttering on the borders of the table; strips of red, white and yellow paper bearing mysterious scripts; and everywhere tinsel, paper, smoke fumes and inoffensive stench. The streets were blocked by the throng of Chinamen, negroes and "superiors," but in the crowd next the coffin and free-lunch table of the gods women predominated. They had a cheerful and animated looking set for the most part, and seemed to be riveted in their tracks by idle curiosity.

A line of hacks and a rank of loitering hackmen occupied one side of the street waiting for their "loads."

At 12 o'clock old white-headed women came out of the house bearing in her skinny arms a huge load of tinsled paper. She threw it on the pavement, and taking a lighted Joss stick set the mass on fire. Then other women brought out some curious-looking images, about 4½ feet high, and supposed to be representatives of saints of excellence. These they cast into the flames, evidently believing that possession of them would certainly appease the malignant gods and give AH FOY a safe entree into the land of the good.

At 1 P. M. the coffin was placed in a hearse, the mourners got into the hacks, and the melancholy procession of pagans and Christians proceeded to Lone Mountain, where the remains will be entombed till the sailing of the next China steamer.

Prehistoric Man.

A somewhat remarkable discovery of human and animal remains has been communicated by Professor CAPELLINI, of Bologna, to the Gazette dell'Emilia. The Professor, on his return from Denmark, whither he had gone to be present at the International Prehistoric Congress, was rendered so sensible by what he had heard there that he was induced to make many excursions in the neighborhood of Spezzia. In the course of these excursions he visited many caverns, and in one of these he was successful in discovering traces of prehistoric man. This was in a grotto in the Island of Palmaria. The access to which was difficult and dangerous. Here he caused excavations to be made, and the result was the discovery of numerous flint and stone implements, the workmanship of which showed they belonged to the earliest period of the stone age. Besides these brought limpets and shells and various other objects, and in the cavern by its human occupants, he found a considerable quantity of bones of animals mingled with bones of human beings. The condition of these latter bones, he says, "would justify the inference that the great bulk had been subjected to anthropophagy, and that the Italians of this epoch were cannibals, like their contemporaries in Belgium, France and Denmark. Among the human bones I found those of women, and part of the jawbone of a child some 7 or 8 years of age. Some of the bones were entire, others were partially detached. In the centre of the cave it was possible to discern traces of a fire-place. Whoever has busied himself in prehistoric researches, whoever has read Spring's excellent work on the Chauvaux cavern in Belgium, and the writings of other authors on the subject of the Danish kitchen-middens, will hasten to admit that the discoveries in the Island of Palmaria prove that the Italians were, as I have said, man-eaters. For the present, it will be sufficient for me to direct the attention of naturalists to the subject. The Cyclopeans spoken of in the fable were probably these cannibals."

FORTUNE TELLING.

The Black Art as Practiced in this City.

The Practitioners and their Victims—Means by Which the Credulous are Duped.

The natural discontent of mankind with its present condition, which, in its proper action, is an important spur to effort for improvement and progress, leads the foolish to endeavors to pry into the secrets of the future instead of going to work to make a future for themselves. The desire to know the future has the effect on weak minds to make them very credulous of pretended prophecies, especially when delivered among surroundings which work upon the imagination intended to be overcome. The ignorant are apt to attribute wonderful powers to the unknown and to them mysterious, and so the wonder of the stars, the complications of numbers, the chance combination of cards or hieroglyphics, and all the unintelligible mummery of the apparently preoccupied mind, can be interpreted to them by the cunning so as to appear to contain marvelous revelations of the past and the future. There have always been charlatans ready to prey upon the foolishness of poor human nature and draw their own support from the weakness of their fellow-creatures. New-York seems to be peculiarly fitted for the operations of all charlatans, and we have a sufficient seventh sons and daughters, readers of the book of destiny, clairvoyants, and all manner of seers of visions and dreamers of dreams, who advertise their vaticinations in the public prints, and work upon their victims in all the highways of the City.

The soothsayer of to-day is generally a woman, who, advertising in the columns of a newspaper as the gifted Mme. Smith, Jones or Robinson, or under some other name equally definite, claims the power of accomplishing all things, curing every species of ill that flesh is heir to, and giving such information as to insure a long life, and the three great desiderata thereto, health, wealth and happiness. These women are mostly poor, ignorant, and are themselves, to a great extent, credulous; they hire a room or portion of a house in some obscure street, and having constructed their webs, like the spider, wait for the unsuspecting fly to enter. There is nothing in them or their surroundings to inspire either awe or respect, and if those who visited them would pause for a moment to think, they would hesitate before investing their money in such a transparent piece of humbuggery.

WHAT THEY PRETEND TO TELL.

A glance at a few of the notices daily seen in the public journals will convey an idea of the kind of wares "sold," and a more perusal will convince even the most sceptical that fraud is at the bottom of the entire business. For example:

ASTONISHING.—Mme. ——, seventh daughter, born with a caul and gift of second sight to tell all that concerns your whole life. Charms to insure speedy marriages and good luck for life without extra charge. Tells lost and stolen articles. Gives information you wish to know, and, to your amazing wonder, tells some very thinkable at first sight. You may rely on it her equal is not to be found. Her magic image is now in full operation.

A GIFT.—Mme. ——, seventh daughter, the celebrated Spiritualist, Trance Medium and Developing Medium and Clairvoyant, has that great French secret causing speedy marriages; tells names and brings to speedy marriage. No charge for information in part.

A FACT.—No imposition. $10 as reward for any one who can equal the greatest European business and medical clairvoyant and astrologist that ever existed in this country; she consults you on all events through life—business, health, marriage, lost articles, cause speedy marriage, brings together those long separated.

Mme. —— can be consulted daily on past, present and future. Ladies 50 cents; gentlemen $1. Shows likeness of future wife or husband.

The great astrologist, Mme. —— tells of instinct, theft, and gives good luck to all.

Mme. —— has astonished thousands by revealing the hidden mysteries of the past, present and future prospects of life, appertaining to love, courtship and marriage, friend will describe the future husband or wife, male or female. Will give physiometrical or phrenological delineations of character, without having a letter from the unknown party; all that is necessary for her to know is when and where the person was born. She will also give a correct account of whether in prosperity or adversity; full of health, sickness or death, describe persons and places, advice respecting law suits, loss or stolen property, and all business transactions.

WONDERFUL.—The Persian Charm or Amulet. It is a foreign compound, can only be obtained by the Rivers Euphrates, Nile and Kidron—obtained the secret when in Persia and the Holy Land, in the year 1844. Persia derived originally from the Priests of the Sun, which never fails to give luck to the wearer; it lightens the heavy heart; with it you can gain the lady or gentleman of your affections; it reconciles the jealous husband and wife; it is a charm against disease; a passport to happiness, &c.; a remedy to bring lovers together, that never fails. Is prepared and sold only by Mme. ——, 10 Bleecker-street.

WHO ARE THE PATRONS.

In nearly every advertisement of this class in the newspapers will be found the significant words at the end, "gentlemen not admitted;" it is therefore easily to be seen that women are the more numerous class of visitors to these places. One of these seers said frankly to a visitor, recently, "We don't like men to call on us, for it is seldom that we can get them to believe what we say; but as for the women, we can make them believe anything we tell them, and what we don't know they tell us." The truth is, that the fortune teller, by a series of adroit questions put to the credulous visitor, becomes possessed of certain essential facts in relation to h.s or her personal history, and afterward, either in a pretended clairvoyant condition or through the cards, patches up a connected story, in which there is enough of general truth to deceive the listener, who goes away wondering how in the world the thing is done. The majority of those who visit fortune tellers are from the poorer classes, who can ill afford to lose even the small pittance demanded by these leeches. The usual fee charged is from fifty cents to five dollars.

A REPORTER'S EXPERIENCE.

It is not often that one has an opportunity of having one's fortune told a score of times in one week. During the past week, however, the writer has endured this infliction, and with nerves still assuasive proposes to give some of the results of his experiences.

On Twentieth-street, not far from Broadway, in a block of small three-story brick houses, two rooms deep. The first floor of one of these houses is occupied by Mme. ——. The neighborhood is dirty and the houses dilapidated. Ringing the doorbell one afternoon, we were invited by a young woman to enter, informed that the Madame was in, and ushered into the back room, upon receiving an intimation that a gentleman was then having his fortune told. We took our seat on one of seven chairs, the only one with a bottom in it, and the only furniture in the room, except a small cooking stove and two pictures, colored lithographs, one representing Hagar and Ismael, scantily clothed, but appropriately so, perhaps, for the section of country which they were supposed to occupy. While thinking of the coming interview, the same young woman entered the room and put coal on the fire. Soon after we were invited into the presence of the soothsayer, and found her to be the same young woman who showed us in, and who put the coal on. The room which we entered was not much better furnished than the previous one, and on a table in the corner lay three packs of cards. Mme. —— is about 28 years of age, rather small in stature, with black hair and eyes, and was clothed rather poorly, in a dress of dark material; she was quick in her movements, and seemed possessed of more than usual intelligence. Sitting at the table, we were asked to cut a pack of what she called "planet cards," differing from the ordinary playing cards, in having various hieroglyphics printed upon them. We cut the dirty pack, she said, because they were manufactured. She then proceeded to divulge the future, as follows:

"You are an unmarried man, but about to take to yourself a wife. This is you," (pointing to a young man printed on one of the cards, with a red necktie.) "and this is your wife which is to be." (The picture of the wife was a representation of Eve in the garden of Eden, being tempted by the serpent.) "You will note the juxtaposition as you run together by the cards; your future will be for a time happy, but your wife will deceive you, and you will never marry again. I find long life to you and wealth, but trouble from a dark-complexioned man. Your wife will be fair-haired, with blue eyes. You may now ask such questions as you desire.

Q.—What is my occupation? A.—A carpenter.

Q.—Do I work myself? A.—No; you design and have a large number of men to work for you.

We had determined in these interviews to add concealing a portrait of a man, and so ended.

Q.—Last week I met with a loss; what was it, and will I ever recover the article? A.—The article lost was round; it was stolen; you will recover it if you advertise.

Having received such a fund of information, we asked the price, and paying it, took our departure. Before leaving, the Madame said her most was good, and that she had seen calls that she could attend to, that she depended on the cards alone, and seldom went into a clairvoyant state, as it injured her health. On going out, she asked with apparent concern whether we were a detective, and on being garnished in the negative, appeared relieved.

The next visit was to the abode of a distinguished clairvoyant in West Twenty-second-street, and were shown by a female servant into a reception room. Mme. —— was evidently better off in a worldly point of view than her less favored sister just seen. Her "office" was well furnished, having the appearance of business; a handsome rosewood writing desk in one corner, and a case containing medical books and a collection of bottles in another. Over the mantle was a large chart, symbolic of some mysterious and the whole aspect of the room was comfortable. Madame seated herself and asked our business. On being told we were in search of that which was lost, she said she could easily find it. She immediately entered into quite an extended conversation, saying that she was a regular physician, in addition to her peculiar gifts; had traveled over the whole of this country and Europe, passed a long time in Paris, where she had frequently been consulted by NAPOLEON; was with General GRANT as an adviser during the war; told him when he would win his battles, and when he was sick that he would recover. And "now you see," she remarked, "he is President, as I was right." Had lived in New-Orleans, and for the past three years in New-York, one year in Thirteenth-street, and two years at her present place of business. And "now," says she, "I will take your money. My fees are from $3 to $5; for the latter sum I go over your whole life, past, present and future, and warn you of all dangers to come."

The visitor suggested that her fees were somewhat high, to which she answered, "My visitors belong to the higher classes, and I never take less." Whereupon we deposited $5, and she after asking the year of our birth, leaning her elbow on a table and throwing a brown silk over her head, then spoke, but not without giving a number of spasmodic movements preparatory to going into a "state:" "You were born under the influence of the star Jupiter; Venus also presided at your birth, and all the spheres made music at your coming. I see a bright future for you, and although you will never be immensely rich, your life will be passed in ease and comfort. You will marry three times; the first of these marriages is already consummated. You will bury the wife you now love on the seventh year from this, and the clods of the valley will also rest upon the bosom of your second partner. Your third will be a widow, and will survive you. You will rear three children; two will die in their infancy. Of those who live, two noble boys and a beautiful girl will bless your household. Of your past, I see that when young, you were several times sick; your health is now good, but between this time and the 29th day of January next be careful, a light-haired woman means you ill. You have had trouble, but have got through with it. You will travel much in the future; will go to Europe, and twice to California by rail; you will live to 82 years of age, and during the last half of your era you will take prominent part in public life. You may now put questions.

Q.—What is my occupation? A.—A speculator, and I should advise that when once or twice you make a stake you invest in real estate.

Q.—In regard to my loss? A.—Your loss was either money, clothing or jewelry. It was not stolen, and you will yet find it. Be of good cheer.

She here removed her veil, and, smiling, said: "Did I give you satisfaction?" and upon receiving the assurance that she had been mistaken in every point, she simply said that "it was marvelous," and bowed us from the room.

Many other places were visited with equally unsatisfactory results to the inquirer. The details of the interviews would be interesting if space admitted of their presentation, but as it does not they must be passed over. Suffice it to say that no two agreed upon any given point, either as to matters of business, love or pleasure, as the intelligent reader well knows.

Occasionally one of these swindling nests is broken up by the police, but not often. It is not easy to see why this class of knaves is overlooked, while others no more guilty are arrested and punished. A raid in this direction would not be without its fruits of good.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

The Ecumenical Council has adjourned until after Epiphany, and much opposition, it is said, will be made to its reassembling; but the Pope expects to be supported by the American Bishops. France is reported to have made known to the Council that infallibility is inopportune religiously revived, and places that country politically otherwise than according to the Concordat, and frees her from obligations then accepted....The London Times, in an editorial, condemns Orange Lodges as tending to perpetuate the idea of two races....The Spectator regards the policy of the President's Message as one calculated "to enhance the position of the United States as a nation"....The English Parliament will meet Feb. 3....A Liverpool dispatch reports the loss at sea of the American ship Crescent City, from Savannah Oct. 30....The Spanish Cortes has restored the constitutional guarantees by a unanimous vote, and yesterday they rejected the Regency bill for indemnifying exiles under the monarchy....Señor MIRAFLORES, the Intendant of Ex-Queen ISABELLA, has denied in the Paris papers the story that she took the crown diamonds with her on leaving Madrid....Fears are entertained of rebellion in Portugal....The navigation of the Baltic Sea is closed for the season....A number of bankers of St Petersburg, Russia, have failed recently, but their names are withheld from the public....The Suez Canal, as reported from the London Admiralty Office, is subject to sand drifts for thirty-five miles, and fogs of such a nature as to bewilder pilots.

CONGRESS.

Progress was made with the Census bill in the House, yesterday, after much discussion. The seventeenth section was agreed to, and the bill as now amended was ordered to be printed. Mr. INGERSOLL again brought forward his currency bill, moving to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means. A motion to table it was rejected by a yea and nay vote of 89 to 65; finally Mr. INGERSOLL's motion was lost and the bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Mr. WALKER, of Ohio, introduced a bill to dispense with the fees and informers of the internal revenue service, and Mr. STEVE, of Tennessee, offered a resolution to annul the recent election in his State. The latter was objected to. A number of papers in regard to the admission of Virginia were presented, and several new bills and resolutions of minor importance, and at 3:30 the House adjourned to Monday.

GENERAL.

The office of the Treasurer of Erie County, at Sandusky City, Ohio, was entered by burglars yesterday morning, the safe blown open with nitro-glycerine, and the contents abstracted. The amount of the loss is not as yet known, nor have any arrests been made, as the thieves left no "tracks."

Why Ruffians Carry Pistols.

There is, to anybody who knows anything of the facts, something very amusing in the trouble which the Courts and the Legislature find in dealing with the "concealed weapons" problem. The Recorder and City Judge charge the Grand Jury about it every year in the most solemn manner, and with some of the finest moral reflections ever listened to on the cowardliness of carrying pistols and knives secreted about one's person, and the atrocity of using them. The Legislature, in making the carriage of weapons a misdemeanor, excepted pistols, which was very like passing an act for the suppression of intemperance, and placing restrictions on the sale of all liquors except whisky. The pistol is the weapon which ruffians naturally carry, for while it contains more mischief in a smaller compass than any other, it may also be used against an enemy with less risk to the owner than any other. A knife large enough to domuch execution, is a very inconvenient thing to conceal, and can only be used with certainty by a very bold and active man. Therefore when the Legislature says to the cut-throats that they may carry pistols as much as they please, provided they lay aside knives, it says in effect, that they may carry such concealed weapons as they prefer.

The reason given for this exception in favor of pistols was, that if their use was prohibited the peaceable and well disposed alone would obey the law, while the ruffians would disregard it, and the result would be that the peaceable and well disposed would find themselves at the mercy of the ruffians. Recorder HACKETT in his charge to the Grand Jury on Wednesday last, touching on this subject, proposed to meet the difficulty by making it a legal presumption "that whoever injured another with a pistol should have intended the injury, in its worse sense;" that is, we suppose, that all assaults committed with pistols should be held to be assaults with intent to kill. The recommendation, if offered in sober earnest, is of course based on the idea that when men draw pistols they do so with the legal distinctions clearly in their mind, and that if we make an assault with a pistol one degree graver than it is now, the change will make a profound impression on the dangerous classes, and the use of pistols in frays will become comparatively rare.

How little support for this theory is to be found in the facts of course most people know; indeed, we are afraid that, considering the length of time Recorder HACKETT has been in City politics, he knows himself, as well as anybody, and better than most people. The reason why ruffians carry pistols and use them, is not that they know their use of them will only count against them as a misdemeanor or assault, but because they expect to escape all punishment whatever; and the reason why good citizens carry them is that they expect to be attacked by the ruffians, and have little hope of seeing the ruffians punished by law if they do attack them. The ruffians would, indeed, be geese as well as ruffians if they troubled their heads about the legal degree of their crimes, in view of the fact that they in a majority of cases evade all but the most trifling penalties. And here we get at the root of the difficulty. If every man who drew a pistol and used it were sure of even three months' imprisonment and hard labor for so doing, the practice of carrying pistols would undoubtedly diminish; but at present he is almost sure of going scot free. As long as the administration of justice in this City is what it is, it makes little difference what penalties are attached to crimes of violence. With reformed Courts the penalties now on the statute book might be cut down one-half, and the security of life and property would be double what it now is.

It is calculated by competent observers that there are now in the pigeon holes of the District-Attorney's office ten thousand untried indictments, or indictments on which convictions have been obtained and sentence suspended. Up to the point of obtaining the indictment, indeed nothing can exceed the ardor with which our indomitable legal functionaries push prosecutions; but the bill once found and the criminal arraigned, a kind of langour steals over the proceedings; the case is never ready for trial; witnesses are not forthcoming, or something happens which causes it to disappear from view, and the culprit resumes his usual avocations. In nine charges out of ten in this City, it happens somehow that the accused is a politician; in fact the close connection between politics and shooting, stabbing and drinking, is very remarkable, and we are satisfied, although we believe no statistics are obtainable on the subject, that there are very few active ward politicians whom it would not be in the power of our District-Attorney to arraign on some old offence, and send to Sing Sing any day he pleased. The District-Attorney, however, hoping they will reform, refrains from bringing them, and waits year after year for the benign influences of our Christian civilization to soften their hearts. They naturally feel grateful for this forbearance, and depraved though they be, appreciating the purity of his motives, testify their gratitude by working for him at elections. The consequence is that under our system of Government, the surest road to political preferment in this City lies through the District-Attorney's office. The man who sits it long enough to accumulate a fair stock of untried indictments, soon reaches a position in which any office in the gift of the people is at his command. The fact is, therefore, that the proper person to put down the use of concealed weapons is that functionary. The Legislature need not trouble themselves about it, for though they grumble themselves over so much, their caps have little effect, unless the public prosecutor thinks well to enforce them. At present he does not; and he would be a very expert layman who could convict him of error in his judgment. As to the Bar arguing in a controversy with him when there is so much more money to be made by keeping quiet, nobody but an idiot would expect anything of the kind.

O'Donovan Rossa.

It is quite clear that the Tipperary election has fallen like a bombshell in English political circles. The papers are full of it. Our London contemporaries think that the Tipperary voters, in returning a Fenian to Parliament, are flying in the face of Providence. Here is Mr. GLADSTONE with his elaborate specifics for curing Irish discontent, and at the very moment he is compounding a fresh one, the patient gets up and throws physician and medicine out of the window. Of course this is very discouraging. No man likes to see his best efforts disregarded. The Tories alone rejoice in the avowed determination of malcontent Irishmen to accept no compromise. They want simply—"Ireland for the Irish," and laugh at any other solution of that famous difficulty which is now said to have attained the respectable age of seven hundred years. As an evidence of this implacable feeling, Tipperary startles all Ireland by choosing as one of her representatives in Parliament, a man who is at this moment undergoing his sentence for taking part in a Fenian conspiracy.

O'DONOVAN ROSSA will not even have the grace to pretend that he is not a Fenian. He seems to be proud of his offence against the authority of the Queen. Even in prison he does everything he can think of to render himself disagreeable. When his jailer enters his cell of a morning, this very uncomfortable Member of Parliament is in the habit of throwing into his face—what most people would rather decline, if they were allowed to have a choice in the matter. As he is a political prisoner, the Governor of the Penitentiary has refrained from ordering special punishment for this playful tendency. The jailer has to take the strange salute with as good a grace as he can command. This, at least, was the statement of Mr. BRUCE, the Home Secretary, to the House of Commons. Whether the Tipperary people loved him for this little peculiarity, or for his general merits as a rebel against the Government, does not certainly appear. But they insisted on having him as their member. A Mr. HENON opposed him at the poll, but poor HENON's supporters reaped the reward of patriotism in having their windows smashed and many of their heads broken. Priests and soldiers were alike driven from the streets by the victorious mob. All this is the consequence, say the Conservatives, of Radical policy. "You have encouraged the Irish people to believe that they could wrest everything from you by working on your fears, and now you will find it not so easy to mend the mischief." These are the Job's comforters who sit down before Mr. GLADSTONE's door.

Happily, there is another side to the question. The Liberals argue that if they are obliged once more to pursue a coercive policy in Ireland, they will be able to do it with less remorse and reproach because of the sincere efforts they first made to redress all reasonable grievances. If they make atonement to Ireland, and Ireland still rebels, the great body of the people will inevitably rally to the support of the Government in vindicating public order. Let us first do right, they say, and after that we shall be in a better position to suppress sedition. As for the London Times, it talks in its old "stamping out," pitiless, half-brutal sort of way. "We must show the Irish," it cries out, "that we can grant relief with one hand and strike down treason with the other." Our spirited contemporary is always for striking down treason—except when it happens to be manifested on the soil of the United States.

The Man of Tipperary is elected member but it is, after all, only a barren honor. "The return of ROSSA," says that spitfire of a paper, the Irish Flag, "is the death warrant of Parliamentary and constitutional agitation." It will not be satisfied with anything short of blood. When the revolution is accomplished, felons may possibly be allowed to enjoy a seat in Parliament. At present there is a prejudice against them. The law will not allow ROSSA to take his seat, and if Mr. HENON petitions for it, he must be allowed to hold it as a matter of course. A felon is as one dead, and a dead man cannot vote in the House of Commons. The hero of Tipperary is likely to languish out his time in prison. The guards have meanwhile been doubled to prevent his rescue. The whole affair is another proof that Mr. GLADSTONE has an extremely difficult—or shall we say impossible?—task before him.

The Ministerial Crisis in Italy.

The consolidation of the Kingdom of Italy has proved to be a more difficult and protracted process than the violent struggle which attended its birth. With component parts so conflicting and so diverse, none of which has had influence enough to impress its distinctive characteristics upon the rest, the organization of the new State might naturally have been expected to present many complicated problems of statesmanship. Unfortunately, since the death of CAVOUR, no Minister has been found able to reconcile the jarring elements of Italian party strife, so as to create a Government strong enough for the wants of the country. The policy of RICASOLI was vacillating and temporizing, and his successor, General MENABREA, has headed two successive Cabinets, only to be obliged at the late opening of the new Parliament to abandon the task of administration in despair. The short-lived Cabinet which resigned its functions on the 20th November was constituted so lately as May last. It endeavored to remedy the weakness of its predecessor by bringing about a coalition between as many representatives as possible of the fractional divisions of Italian parties. The removal of the capital from Turin to Florence had so alienated the Piedmontese deputies that they took entirely aloof from the general political strife. Their adhesion was supposed to have been secured by the appointment to office of Signor FERRARIS. In like manner a former lieutenant of GARIBALDI in Sicily, and a leader of the Conservatives, were included in order to propitiate the third party and the old Government majority. The Premier and his Minister of Finance, Count CAMBRAY-DIGNY, remained to carry out what was the real problem of the Administration, the readjustment of the taxation and expenditure of the Kingdom.

The Ministry is dissolved, and the problem remains as insoluble as ever. Five years have been spent by Italian Parliaments in fruitless party strife, and each succeeding Administration has to confront a steadily increasing deficit, and is obliged to negotiate new loans at enhanced rates. There is, as has been remarked, "a Parliament which professes to make laws, and a Ministry which undertakes to impose taxes, but no one knows whose duty it is to enforce the laws or collect the taxes." The collection of arrears, which amount to no one knows how many millions, would go far to reestablish the credit of the Government, yet no Administration has been found with courage or ability enough to attempt it. As a set off against administrative incapacity, the material wealth of the country is reviving in a way which has no parallel in any other portion of Europe. Everywhere we hear of reclamation of waste lands, the extension of existing branches of manufacture, the creation of new forms of industry, and the introduction of new products of agriculture. The port of Naples has doubled the tonnage of its vessels since it threw off the Bourbon rule. Education is rapidly advancing as well as commerce, and the whole peninsula promises soon to deserve the name of Campania Felix, which a portion of it anciently held. With internal resources so elastic, General CIALDINI, or whoever else may undertake the formation of a new Cabinet, should find little difficulty in rescuing Italian finances from their present state of almost total disorganization.

The Post Office and the People.

That all-pervading and mysterious organization, the Post Office Department, presents in itself a strange epitome of human life, its wants and its feelings, its motive power and even its faults. From the dry figures of the annual report, spring pictures of humanity in every phase, and beneath every sky. The record of how the world exchanges confidences, and how characters, traced by hands that never met and never will, drop in an endless shower wherever there is a civilized being, is full of suggestions, some of which are curious, some amusing and some bearing even a tragic aspect.

During the year to which the report refers, there were received at the department having that branch of the Post Office in charge, 3,759,676 domestic, and 193,186 foreign Dead Letters. A very large proportion of these were sent back to their writers, but there still remain a considerable number which never will, in all human probability, reach their destination. Many contained money—3,757 sums under a dollar, while 2,040 inclosed greater amounts. How much disappointment may not these figures have involved, and how much reproach may not have been unwittingly incurred by the senders! Practical jokers, or perhaps swindlers, mailed 17,417 "fictitious" letters; but the jokes fell flat into the postal grave and lie there. Jewelry and other property was inclosed in 9,071 packets, and 2,734 of them benefit no one. Letters with checks, deeds, drafts and other similar good things, were received to the value of $8,011,554, and 1,639 of them, holding the nominal value of $212,240, are still in the limbo of the undeliverable. Photographs and articles of small value were covered by 114,185, and 10,656 are stowed away. Of ordinary letters received "dead," 394,728 never awakened to life and were finally destroyed; while letters unsigned, or merely circulars, or illegible, were destroyed to the number of 1,188,608.

The Dead Letter Office record alone, then, gives food for reflection. How many changes does it not indicate, how many bereavements, how much carelessness and how much ignorance! The hoped for remittance "never came," though looked for day by day. The little gift for ornament and remembrance missed its way and was lost. The communion of friends, of families, of lovers, by the silent but speaking page, was not to be. The labored scrawl, of some poor emigrant, perhaps, writing of his far-off home, never told his story. The letter is well called dead, for it is the symbol of dead hopes and killed efforts of affection. And yet there is a cheerful view of this office which must not be omitted. So long as the world lasts there will be accidents and blundering. The Dead Letter Office does bury many victims of those evils, but it brings also many more to life. Let us be thankful, therefore, and while thinking of how much self-inflicted pain there is, even in this branch of human action, remember how much of it has been mitigated by one Government agency. The Dead Letter Department is the depository of many disappointments and griefs, but it has driven care and griefs from many thousands of human hearts.

The money-order system, new as it is, has expanded into a very large and important organization. It is very valuable not only to business men but to the people generally. The facilities for safe and speedy circulation of small sums reaches, in its influence, through all classes and grades of society, and constitutes a bond of social fellowship which, whether expressed or not, is not the less real. That 1,055 offices should already be in existence proves the popularity of the money order plan; and when we add that during the year 1,264,143 orders were issued, covering no less than $24,848,088, the magnitude of their operations becomes at once apparent. Something may be added of testimony to the care, industry and skill which the Post-office Department in its various branches requires, and evidently possesses. The Dead Letter and Money Order Departments are administered with a patience and [illegible] which may be said to characterize all the rest.

Accounts upon Life Insurance.

It has happened this year that an unusual amount of critical attention has been bestowed upon the business of life insurance, both here and abroad. The failure of some English companies has led to a close examination of their methods of government, and the discussion about them has widened until it embraced the personnel and management of all companies of whatever grade. There is nothing to object to in this, when the motives of commentators are good, and where they have ventilated the subject with some knowledge of its extent and of the principles upon which the practice of life insurance is based. Publicity is, in fact, the chief safeguard of the system, both as regards the officers of companies and the interests of the insured. Unfortunately, however, much of the comment indulged in by some papers has been shallow in effect if not in intention, and the consequence is that in many cases the minds of policy holders have been unsettled, and some persons have been deterred from becoming insured.

Nothing can be more injurious than this ignorant and haphazard method of dealing with an institution of such immense social importance as life insurance. The interests involved are, in the first place, very large. The amount of outstanding policies in force in New-York alone is stated in the last Superintendent's report at $795,022,277, at the close of 1868, and that of other States was at the same period $741,050,872. The rapid growth of the business will be seen when it is further stated that, in 1859, the amounts were respectively $72,197,496 and $49,200,541. To tamper blindly with the public confidence in the solvency of companies involving sums like these is worse than rash. No subject requires such nice and careful discrimination. For ignorance to approach it is nothing less than criminal, and for willful and disingenuous detraction there is no strong enough term of reproach.

It cannot be too often stated that of all money economics life insurance is best understood by scientific men, and may be best understood by every person possessed of ordinary judgment and common sense. Tables tell us exactly how many persons a year out of a certain larger number will die; the fixed law of averages governing the rate of mortality among a population is as well ascertained as that death itself is the common lot of humanity. Upon this fact is based the value of the expectation of life in each individual case. The duration of aggregated life from all ages points unerringly to the duration on an average basis of every human creature. The annual sum necessary to provide for the settlement of policies as they fall in is, therefore, a mere straightforward calculation which every one can make for himself. And if, besides, the cost of management on the one hand, and the profits from the investment of premiums on the other, be taken into consideration, the whole theory of life insurance is presented. Whether particular companies exceed the due proportion of expenses, or invest their funds unwisely, or charge too low a premium, are matters easily traced, and where discovered are proper for discussion with a view of their being corrected.

Whatever else may be said of life insurance, it is certain to remain a chief provident resource for very large numbers of people. The blessings it has conferred upon millions otherwise left destitute are untold, but are well known to political economists, and by them appreciated. Moreover, these blessings will increase as popular knowledge increases. Especially at this time, when a large proportion of premiums will need renewal, should this be borne in mind. The insured may rest secure in these renewals. They may, and doubtless many of them are, more than ever pressed for money. But let them look upon their life policy as a sacred thing,—as the shield which will protect their loved ones should themselves be removed. This is no trivial duty, nor one that should be frustrated by reckless denunciations, which are generally impelled by ignorance or malice, or both.

Our City Poor and What We Do for Them.

With the setting in of Winter the public and private charities of the City once more attract, as they should, the attention of its public-spirited and philanthropic people. Few, however, of our citizens are probably aware that the institution we call the New-York City Almshouse has now come to comprise no less than twenty different institutions, established on Manhattan, Blackwell's, Randall's, Hart's and Ward's Islands, and that the total annual public expenses on account of the poor of the City, independent of the large sums given by private benefaction, now reach nearly $700,000. These facts are borne out, however, by the report of the State Commissioners of Public Charities which shows, in addition, that last year 28,264 persons were supported in these institutions, and 133,600 received from them temporary relief.

It is admitted that the almshouses of the City and County of New-York are not only far more numerous, but much more complete and satisfactory than those of any other county. Among their best features is the one already alluded to, of minute classification, by which the aged, the young and the sick are provided for in different buildings and on systems specially suited to the inmates. One of the most interesting of these subdivisions at the present season is the "Bureau for Out-Door Poor," in Bond-street, to which all applications for relief, or for admittance to any of the institutions under the control of the Commissioners, are made. The districts into which the City is divided by this Bureau, are thoroughly canvassed by competing visiting agents, and the sum laid out in this way (including a special donation of $17,935 to the blind) amounted last year to $97,930. Connected in interest with this is the "Labor Bureau," (an institution, the existence of which is but comparatively little known to our citizens,) whose object is to transmit unemployed men and women to the interior and the West. Considering that, especially in Winter, in consequence of the weather, there is so much unskilled labor thrown out of employ, it is to be hoped that this Department of our City Charities may be raised to the position which it assuredly should occupy. Last year, there were relieved, with money and fuel, by the "Out-Door" charity, over 30,000 people.

Of Bellevue Hospital (whose annual expenditures of all sorts are about $100,000) we need not speak. It is enough to say that through its instrumentality our sick and injured poor obtain gratis, all the medical skill and all the profusion of remedy that the purses of the rich can command. The Out-Door Poor Hospital treats, on an average, nearly 3,000 persons gratis, and prepares and dispenses nearly 15,000 prescriptions. The statistics of the Morgue, the Charity Hospital, the Bellevue Hospital, and the Fever Hospital, are often placed before our readers, showing their widespread usefulness.

It is remarkable that the Almshouse proper is entirely free from the idle vagabonds who tenant so largely similar institutions in the country. It is really a "Home for the Aged and Infirm," and were its influence not useful, as it is, in removing the stigma popularly affixed to the word "almshouse," which so often prevents the deserving from having recourse to its benefits, the title might appropriately be changed. The report already alluded to, declares with truth that "for cleanliness, good order and attention to diet, the institution is the best of its kind in the State, and admirably meets the ends for which it was designed." No admissions to it are granted, except to those who, from lasting infirmity, are unable to earn a livelihood; and even these inmates are employed in light work, as of tailoring, shoemaking, broom-making, &c., from which considerable revenue, according to the report of the Secretary of the Board is annually derived.

The Hospital for Incurables, the Blind Asylum, and the Lunatic Asylum are three other admirably managed civic charities. The latter, in its turn, has branches for the "harmless insane" and the "paralytic and epileptic"—the whole showing the system which prevails throughout this department.

The Children's Nurseries, the Children's Hospital and the Foundling Hospital, constitute still another division of our public institutions for the poor; the former, on Randall's Island, admit children under four years of age, who are returned when their parents or guardians claim them. If not claimed they are indentured to mechanics or tradesmen, or are sent West under direction of competent agents, and placed in the families of farmers. The children, meanwhile, are well taught. The expenditures of the Children's Hospital were, last year, $37,424. The Foundling Hospital is an institution which was prompted by the fact coming to the knowledge of the Commissioners, that the mortality among infants was nearly ninety per cent. This is about the only institution of which an unfavorable report is presented; but, we are told, "more favorable results are anticipated when the new buildings shall have been completed."

To this summary must be added the Idiot Asylum, Idiot School, Reformatory School, Inebriate Asylum and City Cemetery, which, we believe, completes our list in this class of our City charities. We have thus hastily sketched some outlines of a single work of charity, that of the alms institutions, in response to the natural inquiry made of late to the questions regarding "our poor, and what we are doing for them." We believe that, as a whole, these public institutions are well organized and well managed; and we may add that their success is to be ascribed primarily to their thorough organization and systematic management, their constant and rigid inspection by the Commissioners, and their wholesome rules and regulations. The Board is non-partisan, as, let us hope, it ever will be.

The news which was telegraphed to us from England yesterday we had already given to the public more than a fortnight ago. We are now told that Lord CLARENDON will soon reopen negotiations for the settlement of the Alabama claims, but the information which we were enabled to give our readers is all that can be safely trusted. The Government here are prepared to resume the Alabama negotiations, provided they are carried on at Washington instead of London. The British Government was never likely to make any objection to this proposal. The sufferers by the depredations of LAIRD's cruiser, who have been waiting so long for compensation, are destined, we hope, to get their money before this time next year.

We sometimes fancy that Mexico is further off from us than Egypt, and in respect of the transmission of news it is really so. While we have been hearing every morning from Grand Cairo, Alexandria and the Suez Canal, we have had long intervallums and "flashes of silence" respecting our own ex-Secretary of State, now traveling for health and recreation in a country "marching" so extensively with our own. For a fortnight or more that gentleman has faded away, so to speak, from the diurnal memory of men—as Dr. LIVINGSTONE so often does, though for longer periods—till at last comes an account of him, like the present one, which tells us that on the 9th of last month he was entertained by the Mexican President at a grand banquet where JUAREZ toasted President GRANT and Mr. SEWARD toasted JUAREZ. It was a splendid and significant reunion. But we ought to have known all about it a fortnight ago. Now that the telegraph lines are flying round the world, President JUAREZ should catch one to bring Mexico and Washington within talking distance.

Lieutenants WHEELER and LOCKWOOD, with their forty-six companions, who have been recently exploring the White Pine country of Nevada in a roundabout of 1,100 miles or so—to mark the topography of that rocky region and find a practicable route from the great Pacific Railway down to the head of navigation on the Colorado River—have found that territory not very favorable for agriculture, the climate being very equable and mild, and the snow of Winter never remaining over two days on the ground, though the mid-Summer is hot enough. The mines are its chief interests and attractions at present; but it has a great many others which will be improved in time. The contemplated road which is to open up that lofty and rugged "oberland" will probably run through the fertile and well watered valley of the Pahranagat, a rough sort of name, like everything else in Nevada, but one which will soon become as familiar in print as the Williamette or the Yosemite.

The London correspondent of a contemporary states that "one of the valiant English Garters will certainly be offered by Mr. GLADSTONE to Mr. DISRAELI." It is about the most improbable story that ever correspondent invented. Mr. GLADSTONE does not love his rival—we know of no particular reason why he should. He would never dream of conferring upon VIVIAN GREY, the greatest distinction a commoner can receive. The actual recipients of the Garters will be Lord SHAFTSBURY DE ENCLINTER, that old diplomatist whom KINGLAKE sings praises to, and Lord DE GREY—President of the Council. The matter doesn't signify much, but we may as well have the truth about it.

The East, which once gave so much literary and even scientific instruction to the West, is now looking to Christendom for knowledge in its turn; and, while the sons of Hindostanee Princes and Prince HASSAN of Egypt sit at the school desks of Oxford and Cambridge, we in the farther West have our ingenious and acquisitive Japanese boys to teach and edify. Our compositors, therefore, will have to look sharp after SEMATSUR MATAFORSI, of Sadawowa, and MAHENDROSAN TAMAYEO, Princes both, and also their noble attendants, PERASTAMAN TAGNAB and HARNOOSEN SONDER, who are all four coming to school at Newark; and also take care of ISS SATARA and ZUN ZOW MATSMULLA, who are at present studying in the Naval Academy of Annapolis, in Maryland. These young foreigners are not boys, but youths full grown, and such as will be very apt to learn a great deal more in America than is taught in the classes at school.

Not very long ago the inhabitants of Gloucester, in Massachusetts, sent over some very friendly messages, and a view of their town painted in oil, to the Gloucester in England, from which their forefathers mostly came. The Mayor and Corporation of the original Gloucester were naturally much pleased with this compliment, and they had an address illuminated upon parchment, and a number of beautiful photographs of the cathedral city, made ready for presentation to their American cousins. The other day Captain PRICE, member of Parliament for Tewkesbury, and son of the gentleman who has represented Gloucester in Parliament for twenty years past, was requested to be the bearer of these presents. He was received with great hospitality and kindness by the Selectmen and other inhabitants of the town, and at a public banquet to which they invited him he delivered the address and photographs. This pleasant interchange of courtesies may not be of national importance—it may not settle the Alabama question—but it will be remembered with gratification in the two Gloucesters, and soften the acerbity which "family" jars are apt to produce between nations allied in blood, no less than in the narrower limits of the domestic circle.

Our correspondent "M. N." has offered a suggestion in favor of Alaska which is not unworthy of consideration. He says that somewhat muggy and fog-infested peninsula owes its condition to its heavy forest covering, and argues that if this were removed the region would lose its mists in a great degree and become more suitable for agriculture and as a residence of men. In this connection may be mentioned the cases of England, Ireland and Scotland, which in soil and climate have been confessedly improved by the loss of their old forestry, which spoiled the cereal harvests of these countries. When its cloud-compelling woods shall be cleared away, Alaska will probably be found a very mild and comfortable place to live in—a fact, however, which will have more interest for our posterity than for ourselves.

The German-American Cable.

From the Times, (City Article,) Nov. 30.

The arrangement with respect to the German-American telegraph cable, referred to yesterday, is that the concession from the North German Confederation of all telegrams for America not otherwise expressly directed by the sender to be sent by some other route, as well as the right to carry German and English messages, will be effected by a German-English Company shortly to be formed. The concession has been purchased for this new Company, but not by the Anglo-American Company. The caution money (100,000 thalers) has been deposited, and the necessary contracts and arrangements are made. A being made. A three-wire cable is to be laid from North Germany to Lowestoft, two conductors to be used for German-English messages, and the third exclusively for German-American messages. This third wire is to be connected with one of the Anglo-American lines from Telegraph-street to the United States, which is agreed to be appropriated, but not exclusively, for the transmission of German-American correspondence. The messages will be sent in the order of reception at the terminal and intermediate stations as required by the International Telegraph Convention. The Anglo-American and Newfoundland Companies are to give a rebate to the German Company on messages passing through the new cable and the Atlantic lines, but the chief source of revenue of the new company is expected to be the German-English traffic, which has increased enormously of late years. The act of Parliament passed last session specially excepted from the Postmaster-General's monopoly telegrams to and from foreign countries.

The Election in Texas—How it was Conducted.

From the Houston Telegraph, Dec. 4.

The election in this county, we confess candidly, has passed off as quietly as any election we have ever seen; in fact we are free to say more so, and we attribute this happy result to the forethought of General REYNOLDS in prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the immediate vicinity of the polls. We have seen no fight, and have heard of none that can be traced directly or remotely to the preference shown in the choice of voting for the selected candidate. For the past two days a bountiful barbecue was prepared for all who chose to avail themselves of the offer of good things to eat. This was a happy thought, and very ably managed throughout. We might be thought remiss in our remarks were we to omit to mention the very able, fair and honest discharge of his duties during the four day's trial through which we have passed, of Mr. Sheriff HALL, and we feel safe in say that to him our citizens are indebted in no small degree for order preserved. The total vote foots up 2,300.

Yale College—The Price of Tuition Raised.

From the New Haven Journal, Dec. 11.

We understand that the corporation of Yale College, at their last session, determined to raise the annual charge for tuition in the academical department to $80, after the present collegiate year. It is expected that this addition to the income of the College will enable the corporation to meet some pressing wants and make some of the advances in the means of education which are demanded, and without which the College cannot sustain its past reputation or its present high position. We have no doubt that such arrangements will be made that no needy and meritorious student will be allowed to suffer from this increased rate of tuition, which will be really no higher than in many of the leading preparatory schools.

Disabled Soldiers and Sailors.

A ball will be given at Irving Hall on Thursday night next, for the benefit of the fund set aside by the Grand Army of the Republic for the relief of disabled soldiers, sailors and widows and orphans. This ball will be conducted under the auspices of Post Cameron, No. 79, an announcement which will satisfy all that the arrangements will be of the most complete and satisfactory nature. Large numbers of tickets have been sold, and all who choose to attend may be assured of having a good time. There is no more deserving charity in our midst than this, which seeks to keep from want and suffering those who fought gallantly in the late war. There are hundreds of them in this City in destitute circumstances, and the care of them is perhaps the noblest work done by the Grand Army of the Republic. Our citizens should aid them on every occasion.

AMUSEMENTS.

Music and the Drama.

The past week has been an interesting one at the opera houses. On Monday, the Richings Troupe produced the "Huguenots," with considerable splendor, against "William Tell," at the Academy. Some of the singing in the "Huguenots" was extremely bad, yet the work was so well placed upon the stage and the dresses of Mrs. RICHINGS-BERNARD in the production so generally felt and acknowledged that it was favorably received. This is the first time that the whole opera, or nearly the whole opera, has been sung in English. With the week's performances, winding up last night with their real success of the season, "The Bohemian Girl," the occupancy of the Grand Opera House by this company terminates. Their season has proved substantially fortunate. Good houses have been frequented with them, and they have had some great ones. This result was hardly expected by even the most intelligent observers. It was supposed that the public appetite for English opera had been satiated by the excellent performances of the Parepa-Rosa Troupe. Events have proved the contrary; yet there is no doubt that the completeness and fidelity with which the Richings Troupe have done their work gradually won the public over, and converted languid interest into generous support. "William Tell" chewed vindicated attraction on Monday at the Academy, and was repeated yesterday to a fine house at the matinee. On Wednesday "Il Trovatore" was repeated, when Signor LEFRANC was in splendid voice, and so excited popular enthusiasm by his generally capital singing, as well as by his si de poitrine, as to be called seven times before the curtain. On Friday "Pipelé," a comic opera by DE FERRARI was brought out for the first time in this country. It is a work of no great calibre but will, perhaps, take rank with the RICCI's "Crispino e la Comare." Miss KELLOGG appeared in it to great advantage, and Signor BORGONI revoled in a drunken scene to the infinite relish of the audience. The New-York public has a youthful fondness for opportunities to indulge in broad hilarity, and this fact will perhaps endow "Pipelé" with more vitality here than it has enjoyed elsewhere. It is to be repeated on Monday.

The series of popular concerts which the Young Men's Christian Association are giving to the public every Saturday afternoon supply a want long felt. The one yesterday was well attended, and the pecuniary success of what might be considered an experiment seems assured. Mr. WARREN, the organist of Grace Church, presided at the organ, and most ecstatically. While not so much of a pedal-player as MORGAN, his execution is much more accurate. Mr. J. R. THOMAS either had a severe cold or was indisposed—to do himself justice. This was more noticeable in his rendering of the Infidèle from "Ernani," than in his subsequent efforts. Miss STERLING was in capital voice and her rich contralto was never more welcome. She is evidently a favorite, and her lively yet substantial selections and admirable rendering of them won the hearty applause of the audience. The two other performers were Miss JOANNA and Master WILLIE HESS, who, on the piano and violin respectively, showed what patient practice can accomplish. Master WILLIE is apparently about 12 years of age, and has attained such executive skill on the violin as to almost entitle him to be regarded as a musical prodigy. Before dismissing the subject of these concerts we may suggest that were they to commence earlier and to be less delayed by encores and protracted intermissions, they would be more thoroughly enjoyable.

Some complicated machinery to be used in "Hamlet" not being ready, that tragedy is postponed for a week at Booth's Theatre, and Mr. HACKETT is to fill the nights with his much admired representation of Falstaff in the "Merry Wives of Windsor." It is now understood that "Hamlet" will be acted on Monday, Dec. 20. At Wallack's the bills have been changed nightly and the same policy will be observed in the ensuing week. "The Wonder," which was beautifully placed upon the stage on Monday, is to be repeated next Thursday. The "Captain of the Watch" and "Woodcock's Little Game," which constituted the attractions of Tuesday, are given again on the same night of this week. On Monday (to-morrow) "Ernestine" and "Trying It On," will be performed; and on Wednesday "Still Waters Run Deep." O'KEEFE'S still approved comedy of "Wild Oats" is underlined at the house as in preparation.

At the Fifth-avenue Theatre great industry has likewise been displayed in varying the entertainments. Standard and modern comedies have been enacted in rapid succession, and the patrons of this pretty theatre have abundant reason to be satisfied with the enterprise of its manager. On Monday "Don Cæsar de Bazan" is promised, with the new farce "A Poor Goose." On Wednesday the "Irish Heiress" will occupy the boards. For Thursday "Everybody's Friend" is announced, and on Saturday there will be a repetition of the performance of Monday.

At the French Theatre the scenic play of "London" is withdrawn after a prosperous run, and the house will be closed on Monday and Tuesday. On Wednesday a decided novelty is promised in the appearance of a full Russian opera company, headed by the tenor, M. AGRENEFF-SLAVIANSKY, and including many artists of reputed ability. There will be a full chorus and orchestra and a Russian ballet. We have had previous occasion to refer to the merits of some of the artists of this company, and, in anticipation of their appearance in opera, think it due to them to say that several of them are performers of talent and likely to whatever they undertake to give a good account of themselves.

At other houses no representation of moment calls for present attention. At the New-York Theatre interesting performances of French comedy and operetta were given during the week. At Wood's Museum, "Kentworth" was acted day and night. At the Olympic, "Under the Gaslight" was interpreted, and remains on the bills until further notice. The Bowery has delighted its frequenters with interminable entertainments, and continues this week to offer tremendous programmes, of which "The Dual in the Mist" will be the pièce de résistance. The pantomime of "Hash," which was to have been given by the San Francisco Minstrels to-morrow, will not be brought out until Dec. 20; the soirées of this troupe are as numerously attended as ever. At the Circus, Miss PAULLINE HINDLEY has ridden, and all the troupe has appeared. This week the preparations for the Christmas spectacle will be completed at this favorite place of amusement.

Domestic Items.

Mr. GAYLER has returned verbal thanks to the Buffalo public for their kind reception of "Fritz; our German Cousin," written by him expressly for Mr. JOE EMMET....Mr. JOHN BROUGHAM acts in Buffalo next week.... Their opera season was to begin at once.

Russian Gossip.

MRS. JOHN WOOD AT THE ST. JAMES'.

The Times of Nov. 29 says: "On Saturday night Mrs. JOHN WOOD, the present 'manageress' of the St. James', made her first appearance in a burlesque entitled "La Belle Sauvage," and achieved a brilliant success. The burlesque is a modification of Mr. JOHN BROUGHAM'S "Pocahontas," probably the most popular work of the kind ever brought out in the United States. When Mr. BROUGHAM took for his subject the loves of the half-savage Princess and the English adventurer, Smith, he makes a conspicuous figure in the early history of Virginia, he had in New-York a public to whom the story was quite as familiar as is the commonest Greek myth to a well-trained schoolboy. Produced at the Princess' Theatre, under the management of Mr. HARRIS, 'Pocahontas' proved an utter failure, although the Indian chief, Powhatan, was represented by Mr. BROUGHAM himself, who had shaken with laughter the sides of every American playgoer. The subject was not understood, and the actor was not nearly so comical in London as he had been in New-York. Here, when he revisited England, after a long absence, Mr. BROUGHAM was remembered as one of the best delineators of Irish character, and as a star in that galaxy of talent which shone forth at the Olympic in the days of Madame VESTRIS. But he was not a comedian so firmly established in London that, like the late Messrs. WRIGHT and JOHN REEVE, he could take amusing liberties with his audience, whereas this was the very thing which he could do at New-York, not only with impunity, but to the delight of his public. Mr. JOHN BROUGHAM holds a hand-in-glove position with his New-York patrons, who always contrive to draw him into a neat speech between the intervals of a performance, and rest to hear him declare that he is 'unaccustomed to public speaking.' But at the Princess' we had King Pocahontas with the fun left out, and failure was the consequence. Mrs. JOHN WOOD, taking in hand the previously unfortunate burlesque, goes to work with that dashing transcendental spirit which characterizes all the details of her management. Instead of the drop scene to the 'fall of the play.' The dialogue she reduces to a minimum, new music and dances she scatters broadcast, and the result of the operation is one of the most lively and amusing entertainments to be seen in London. The merriment, too, is of a sort that everyone can appreciate. The marvelous vivacity of Mrs. WOOD as the Indian Princess, and the grotesque humor à la Callot of Mr. LIONEL BROUGH, who is rapidly taking a position as one of the first comedians of the day, can be perfectly understood by those who know nothing of the 'old dominion,' while the scenery and costumes are in every way worthy of the admirable taste manifested in the decoration of "She Stoops to Conquer." Let us add that the Smith of Mr. LIONEL BROUGH is well matched by Mr. MARCUS HILL, who plays the Indian Chief with much comical pomp and circumstance."

THE M'FARLAND DIVORCE

How it was Obtained in Indiana—The Documents and Evidence Offered in the Case.

Correspondence of the Cincinnati Commercial.

INDIANAPOLIS, Thursday, Dec. 9, 1869.

Some time in the month of August, 1869, Mrs. MCFARLAND appeared in the town of Martinsville, and, calling upon Attorneys HARRISON & SHIRLEY, made known her residence in Morgan County, town of Mooresville, and engaged their services to assist Messrs. FORTER, FISHBACK & HARRISON in procuring her a divorce. Mrs. MCFARLAND was accompanied by her little son, and, as in the interview with Mr. FORTER, by her modest and self-sustained deportment made so favorable an impression that these gentlemen undertook her case at once, and Mr. SHIRLEY invited her to his house to dine. In the afternoon she returned to Mooresville, but her petition was duly filed and reads as follows. It will be observed that in the petition the second initial (W.) of the defendant's name is omitted, a fact which attracted the notice of the country officers, in the recent publication of the habeas corpus for the recovery of PERCY S. MCFARLAND, eldest son of DANIEL W. and ABBY S. MCFARLAND:

State of Indiana, Morgan County—In Common Pleas Court, October Term, 1869.—ABBY S. MCFARLAND vs. DANIEL MCFARLAND.—ABBY S. MCFARLAND complains of DANIEL MCFARLAND and says that on the 16th day December, 1857, she was married to the defendant, and from that time until the term of her separation from him, she, the plaintiff, was, and ever since to him a faithful and dutiful wife. But she says that soon after her marriage to the defendant, he began to treat her with unkindness and neglect, and to use her with rudeness and neglect increasingly until said separation; that, meanwhile, the defendant fell into intemperate habits, and spent a large part of his time at drinking places, and at places of low resort, and, when he was at home, was habitually surrounded with intoxication; that during said last two years he led most of the time a life of idleness and vice, and contributed nothing toward the support of the petitioner and their children, and that herself and said children were during that time supported solely by the industry of the petitioner; that in consequence of such continued ill-treatment and cruelty on the part of the defendant, and total neglect to make reasonable provision for her support, she could not continue to live with him, but was compelled to separate from him, which she did on the first day of February, 1867, since which time they have never lived together.

And the petitioner says that there is no prospect whatever of any reconciliation between herself and defendant; and she further says that she has been a resident of the State of Indiana more than one year previous to the filing of this petition, and is now a resident of Morgan County, in said State.

Wherefore she prays an order dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between herself and defendant, and for all other proper relief; and she also asks the custody of her two children by said marriage—PERCY S. MCFARLAND, aged about 10 years, now aged 12, and W. MCFARLAND, aged about 8 years—because said defendant is an unsuitable person to have the care or custody of said children, for the reasons aforesaid.

FORTER, HARRISON & FISHBACK,
HARRISON & SHIRLEY, Attorneys.

Petition filed Aug. 10, 1869.

At the same time and place the affidavit of one W. H. HARRISON, non-resident, was filed, and read as follows:

STATE OF INDIANA, MORGAN COUNTY.—In Morgan Common Pleas Court, Oct. 16, 1869.—ABBY S. MCFARLAND vs. DANIEL MCFARLAND.—Divorce.—WILLIAM H. HARRISON swears that he has no interest in said cause, and that said defendant, DANIEL MCFARLAND, is not, as he believes, a resident of the State of Indiana, but is a non-resident thereof. W. H. HARRISON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, Aug. 9, 1869. Witness my hand and notarial seal.

W. S. SHIRLEY, Notary Public.

Upon which affidavit the Clerk issued the following notice:

State of Indiana, Morgan County, ss.—To the Common Pleas Court of Morgan County, in the State of Indiana, October Term, 1869.—ABBY S. MCFARLAND vs. DANIEL MCFARLAND.—Be it known that on this 16th day of October, in the year 1869, the above-named plaintiff, by her attorneys, filed in the office of the Clerk of said Court her complaint against defendant, in the above-entitled cause, together with an affidavit of a competent person, that said defendant is not a resident of the State of Indiana. Said defendant is, therefore, hereby notified of the filing of said complaint against him, and that unless he appear and answer or demur thereto, at the sitting of said court, at the second day of the next term of said Court, to be begun and held at the Court House in Martinsville, on the first Monday in October, 1869, said complaint, and the matters and things therein contained and alleged, will be heard and determined in his absence. JOHN HARDWICH, Clerk.

FORTER, HARRISON & SHIRLEY, Attorneys for plaintiff.

Sept. 22, 1869, proof was filed of notice having been given as follows:

ABBY S. MCFARLAND vs. DANIEL MCFARLAND.—Divorce. Comes the plaintiff, by HARRISON & SHIRLEY, her attorneys, and, on motion, files proof of having given notice of the pendency of this suit according to law, which notice was published in the Farmers' Advocate, a Court E. W. CAYLOR, editor and publisher of the Morgan County Gazette, a weekly newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the town of Martinsville, Morgan County, Ind., when upon his oath, says that the annexed notice was published in said newspaper for four weeks successively, to wit, on the 14th, 21st and 28th days of August, and the days of September, 1869. E. W. CAYLOR.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 8th day of September, 1869. JOHN HARDWICH, Clerk.

Oct. 5, 1869.

Come again the plaintiff, by her attorneys aforesaid and on motion defended her suit, and comes not defendant. Cult. 12, 1869, come again the plaintiff by her attorneys aforesaid, and this matter is now submitted to the Court for trial, and the evidence being heard, the Court takes the matter under advisement.

The reader having, by these presents, been somewhat initiated into the mysterious formula of divorce, is now prepared for the last scene enacted—the hearing or trial of the case.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of Oct. 14, the plaintiff arrived in Martinsville, accompanied by her father, Mr. SLOS, of Charlestown, Indiana, and Mrs. LOUIA P. CALHOUN, of the New-York Tribune. They proceeded quietly to the Mason House, and, after a conference with the plaintiff's attorneys, eat their supper, and between 8 and 9 o'clock, assembled in the Judge's room, in the Court House. The hearing was irregular, as you will observe, and as strictly private as the law would allow. Beside Judge WOOLEN, there were present the plaintiff, her father, friend and Martinsville attorneys, Mr. HARDWICH, County Clerk, and his deputy, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MCNUTT, the attorney appointed for the State in the absence of Mr. HANPHEN, and half-a-dozen attorneys who had lounged in without any special interest in the case. The plaintiff was very plainly attired in a suit of brown, and exhibited considerable emotion, but was evidently sustained by words of encouragement from her friend, Mrs. CALHOUN.

The first witness called in the case was Mr. SAGE, who, instead of neither a witness nor desired, was either actually sworn or hoodwinked to be sworn unwitting, for all of his testimony was elicited by Judge Woolen, and he (Sage) unwittingly.) Mr. SAGE testified as follows:

That DANIEL MCFARLAND, when addressing his daughter, had represented that he was a bachelor, that Mrs. McFar. was a widow, and that he (SAGE) had never heard of MCFARLAND having any claims; MCFARLAND had also stated that he owned a farm in Montgomery County, and the witness (SAGE) did not think it could have been of much account, as when his daughter married MCFARLAND and went with him to live on the land, she was nearly starved. Here, when asked by the plaintiff's attorney if MCFARLAND intoxicated, he replied:

"Almost from the first of their marriage. He was either very kind or very hard on her. He would often drink too much liquor, and when he was in liquor he was a moderate, abusive and violent man."

When asked to specify abuse and violence, he stated that under the influence of liquor MCFARLAND could not sleep, and he would rave and storm and break the furniture and crockery. His daughter was afraid of him and very unhappy. In about a year after her marriage her husband brought her home and abandoned her. This was the first time, he (SAGE) had ever heard of MCFARLAND before the first case. Her eldest child was born in her father's house. It was after the birth of this son that MCFARLAND wrote the letter asking forgiveness for his faults, and begging her to live with him again. The letter was produced in court, and, without being evidence, the reading of it was granted by the Court. It covered, probably, two pages of letter paper, and abounded with expressions of tenderness. Its perusal awakened a sentiment of pity for the man, who acknowledged that his passion for drink had made him a brute toward the woman he treated and adored. At the close of his testimony, Mr. SAGE was cross-examined by the Attorney for the State, but his statements were substantially the same as above, and added no weight to his evidence.

At this point Hon. A. G. PORTER and Mr. THEODORE HAUGHEY, of Indianapolis, arrived. When sworn, Mr. PORTER testified that Mrs. MCFARLAND was introduced to him notice by the most respectable people of New-York, and that the modest recital of her wrongs, together with her uniform courtesy and refinement, had of themselves commanded his respect. Since her stay in Indianapolis, she had conducted herself with propriety, and was quietly and supporting herself and child by her pen. Her petition seemed a just one, and he prayed the Court to grant it. Mr. HAUGHEY appeared as the banker through whom Mrs. MCFARLAND regularly received remittances from different publishers. Mrs. McFARLAND was an authoress and newspaper contributor. She was introduced to him by Vice-President COLFAX.

The next and last witness called upon to testify in this case, was Mrs. LUCIA D. CALHOUN.

Mrs. CALHOUN—I shall not attempt to give her statement verbatim—Mrs. CALHOUN formed Mrs. MCFARLAND's acquaintance through the medium of a communication that lady sent to the Tribune. The acquaintance ripened into a friendship which continued until Mrs. McFarland's death, during which time they (Mrs. C. and Mrs. McF.) lost sight of. They met, accidentally, on the street, and Mrs. CALHOUN, generous friend that she was, followed her up to a squalid abode in Amity-street. She pressed some money upon Mrs. MCFARLAND for immediate necessities, and soon procured her permanent relief. It was while Mrs. MCFARLAND occupied this miserable abode that Mrs. CALHOUN became an involuntary witness of Mr. MCFARLAND'S cruelty. She saw him coming home, staggering with intoxication, and ran upstairs to tell his wife. Before she could make her escape he entered the room, and, seeing his wife sitting quietly up in bed, for she had been engaged in writing, he made a rush toward her, and snatched the paper from her. He followed this up by knocking over the chairs and stand, and breaking all the crockery he could lay his hands upon, in the midst of which innocent diversion he suddenly recovered the presence of Mrs. CALHOUN. It did not have the effect of sobering him, but from that date he became her enemy. She had never seen him strike his wife, but she asked the honorable Judge if any woman with the key turned in the lock was safe with such a husband.

She testified further that Mr. MCFARLAND had not supported his wife, and that she, with others, encouraged Mrs. MCFARLAND to attempt dramatic readings. She had also sustained her efforts on the stage, which, brought to an unloward end by the first attempted assassination of Mr. RICHARDSON, succeeded by Mrs. McFARLAND'S efforts. In and through all Mrs. MCFARLAND'S eventful career as a wife and as petitioner for divorce, Mrs. CALHOUN proclaimed her a true and pure woman, whose cause she felt to be honor to espouse. In the enumeration of her wrongs, she (Mrs. CALHOUN) testifiedly stated that Mrs. McFARLAND had not the heart to confess. "In unhappy marriages, the deepest wrongs are those which admit of no complaint." This is one of the eloquent passages with which Mrs. CALHOUN'S statement closed. She was submitted to a brief examination, His Honor took the case under advisement, and the Court adjourned.

The next day, Oct. 15, Mrs. MCFARLAND, her father and a friend, departed from Martinsville on the early train, and have not seen them more. Whether before their departure they had the satisfaction of beholding the subjoined document of that date, I am unable to say:

OCTOBER 15, 1869.

Come again the plaintiff, by her attorneys aforesaid, and the Court, being only advised, finds for the plaintiff, and grants a divorce. It is therefore ordered and adjudged by the Court that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between the parties be set aside and held for naught. And it is further ordered by the Court that the plaintiff have the custody of the young children, DANIEL W. MCFARLAND and PERCY; and it is further ordered and adjudged by the Court that the plaintiff recover of defendant her cost herein expended.

Record signed Oct. 15, 1869.

W. WOOLEN, Judge.

The above completes the record of the McFarland divorce. The reader can form his own conclusions. It may not be improper to add that the plaintiff paid the costs, and I would call attention to the early date of Mr. MCFARLAND'S mistreatment of his wife, as shown by the evidence of her quaint and respectable father, in-law, that it was the in none of the evidence is there anything to indicate that Mr. MCFARLAND was, or had ever been either a rich or prosperous man. Genealogical and Biographical Society—A paper on the late Mr. Raymond, by Augustus Maverick.

At the regular meeting of the Genealogical and Biographical Society last evening, Mr. AUGUSTUS MAVERICK read a paper on the late Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND. The name RAYMOND, he said, was of French origin, but the genealogical record of the family in this country could only be traced back about 60 years. Commencing with the father of Mr. RAYMOND, who emigrated from Connecticut, and became one of the pioneers of Western New York, the speaker sketched the early history of HENRY J. RAYMOND, his entrance into the University of Vermont, whence, after graduating he came to this City, his journalistic labors in connection with the New-Yorker, his subsequent career on the Tribune and Courier & Enquirer, and, finally the establishment of the NEW-YORK TIMES, which formed a new era in New-York journalism. The political career of Mr. RAYMOND was also alluded to, and the paper closed with a kind and appreciative sketch of his characteristics as a man, a friend and an employer. Mr. MAVERICK is said to be engaged in writing a book on the life and times of Mr. RAYMOND, from which the sketch read last evening was mainly extracts.

Shaving Prospects at the City Ponds.

The increased temperature of Friday night and Saturday morning rendered the ice as soft as a new cheese and quite yet a step to all skating. On MACKELLAN'S pond a few persons assembled during the afternoon, and made an attempt to glide over the frozen surface, but it was found that the ice had melted for nearly an inch in depth, and that skating was quite out of the question.

At the Central Park, the houses for the accommodation of skaters, and the lamps for illuminating the lakes at night, have been placed in position. Yesterday the lakes were covered with a tolerably solid coat of ice, but it will require twenty-four hours of hard frost to render them safe for the crowds that usually assemble on them.

At the Rink in Sixty-third-street, preparations will be made soon for the Winter, but there need probably be no hurry about it, as it is not likely that we shall have much hard weather before

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The arrangements for the first of a series of full-dress promenade concerts to be given by the Seventh Regiment are now complete, and the Music Committee announce that the initial will take place on Thursday evening next at the Academy of Music, when the band will number 100 performers. The tickets are limited to 1,000, each admitting a lady and gentleman, with the usual ladies' tickets. It is anticipated that nearly all of the tickets will be taken up in the regiment. This concert cannot fail to be a great success, as Herbert have been the promoters of the event, and the Committee of Arrangements have issued one of the handsomest notices we have ever seen. An auction sale was held last evening at the armory for the disposal of private boxes. Members of the regiment are expected to appear at the concert in full uniform, officers and citizens will attend in citizens dress.

On Thursday last, Captain Charles W. Squier, late of the Fifth Excelsior Brigade, died at the New-York Hospital in consequence of injuries accidentally sustained a few days before. Captain Squier was engineer officer on General Sickles' staff, and distinguished himself at the battle of Williamsburg; in 1862, by disclaiming two of Webber's abandoned guns in the very teeth of the enemy's advance. He was, at the time of his death, Assistant Superintendent of the Eastern Division of the Erie Railway, and rode on the cowcatcher of a locomotive during the recent strike in order to inspect the road. While approaching Passaic Station Captain Squier noticed a switch misplaced, rashly leaped from the engine and attempted to repair the error, being run over by the train and had both feet terribly mangled. The officers of the Excelsior Brigade held a meeting on Thursday at the office of General Graham, and adopted a series of resolutions tendering their sympathy to the bereaved family and resolving to attend his funeral and cherish his memory as a soldier of marked courage and ability, and one who faithfully discharged his whole duty. Captain Squier served at Yorktown, Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, Malvern Hill, Bristow Station, Chancellorsville, and as engineer on the staff of General Berney, Second Division of the Third Army Corps.

The officers and non-commissioned officers of the Eighth Regiment are ordered to assemble in full fatigue, for instruction and drill, at the armory, on the evenings of Dec. 17 and 20, and Jan. 4, 11, 18 and 25. Roll will be called at 7:45 P. M., prompt.

Captain Abner Mellen, Jr., Adjutant-General of the Third Brigade, held a reception at his residence, No. 115 East Twenty-third-street, on Wednesday night. It was attended by a most select party of ladies and gentlemen.

The following officers in the First Division have been commissioned by the Commander-in-Chief during the fortnight ending Dec. 4: First Brigade Cavalry—John D. Lyon, Quartermaster. Fifth Brigade—John T. Burleigh, Captain and Aide-de-Camp; William H. Thompson, Engineer. Second Cavalry—John Sheridan, Second Lieutenant. Seventh Infantry—Edward G. Arthur, Captain; James H. Lounsbery, First Lieutenant; Milton B. Sweet, Second Lieutenant; Gulian V. Quillard, First Lieutenant; Edward J. Steel, Second Lieutenant. Eighth Infantry—Edward Baker, Captain; Lewis A. Myers, First Lieutenant; Alexander L. Whitelaw, Second Lieutenant; William Rose, Second Lieutenant; Frank A. Butler, Second Lieutenant; N. Gene Dunn, Lieutenant-Colonel. Ninth Infantry—Robert P. Courtney, Captain; J. Alfred Theriott, First Lieutenant; Edward G. Howland, Second Lieutenant. Twelfth Infantry—Richard A. Biker, Quartermaster; John B. Morse, Commissary. Twenty-second Infantry—Edward A. Taylor, Second Lieutenant. Fifty-fifth Infantry—Henry Huck, Captain; Anthony Lambrecht, Second Lieutenant. Seventy-first Infantry—Samuel W. Osgood, Captain; Samuel B. Jackson, First Lieutenant; Thomas W. Lowe, Second Lieutenant. Ninety-sixth Infantry—Gottfield Reichert, Second Lieutenant; John Kozlowski, Captain.

The following resignations of officers in the First Division have been accepted by the Governor: First Cavalry—Frederick Berringer, First Lieutenant; Francis Reese, Captain. Washington Grey Cavalry—William Gray, First Lieutenant. Fifth Infantry—Marcus Martens, First Lieutenant. Sixth Infantry—Adam Edenwald, First Lieutenant; Anton Wirbach, First Lieutenant. Fifty-fifth Infantry—William W. Strew, Surgeon; Frederick Zimmer, Captain; John H. Rapp, Jr., Second Lieutenant; Ritter C. Hadley, First Lieutenant. Ninety-sixth Infantry—George Kleischer, Quartermaster; Joseph Koch, Second Lieutenant.

The officers and members of Company G, Seventy-first Regiment, gave a musical and dramatic entertainment on Friday evening at their new armory in Thirty-second-street, near Sixth-avenue. The enterprise was a successful one, the room containing an audience of over 1,200 persons. The programme presented by the Committee was both varied and excellent, comprising the performances of the Alleghanian vocalists and bell-ringers, pianoforte interpretations by Harry Sanderson, recitations by Mr. Wm. H. Pope, and a farce by an amateur company. Miss Hilfert proved too hoarse for singing, which was to be regretted, as she is a fine vocalist. The Alleghanians, however, succeeded in winning several encores, as did also Messrs. Sanderson and Pope. The recitations of the latter gentleman fully sustained his reputation, and the audience was thrilled by the dramatic rendition of the "Dying Soldier," "Barbara Frietchie" and "Sheridan's Ride." The amateurs were also successful, the blunders being confined exclusively to the title of their farce. The idea of Company G is a very good one.

Regimental Courts Martial for the trial of delinquent non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates of several regiments in the First Brigade are ordered to convene at the respective armories, on Monday, the 10th of January next, at 8 o'clock P. M. Detail for the Courts—For the Second Infantry, Major John O'Shaugnessy, commanding; for the Twelfth, Captain Charles L. McGowan; for the Seventy-first, Lieutenant-Colonel George B. Wolcott.

The Washington Grey Cavalry again court public notice by the announcement that it is proposed to abandon the cavalry arm, and organize as a howitzer battery, using the guns that they unceremoniously threw away in the Sepoy war on Staten Island. We hope this rumor will prove true, for it is about the time the Greys did something to redeem their credit, lost to a great extent by the spasmodic efforts of its officers to raise the command into a battalion. A howitzer battery is needed, and the Grays are peculiarly fitted for that purpose.

The State Examining Board will hold its next meeting at Albany on Friday next for the examination of officers from the northern part of the State.

The First Division Court Martial ordered for the trial of General, staff and field officers for absence from drill, parades, &c., during the past year will meet its sittings on Tuesday next.

General Butler's new plan of paying pensions to heirs of deceased soldiers is not yet fully understood, but its general principle seems to be that of employing the Post Office system as a means for distributing the regular payments. If the bill is drawn with sufficient care to meet this purpose, it would seem to be an admirable arrangement, both for the Government and the pensioner.

An election was held on Wednesday last in the Thirteenth Regiment, when Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick A. Mason and Major Philip H. Briggs were each advanced a step by an unanimous vote. Captain E. S. Daniels, of Company G, was also informally elected Major by a two-third vote.

The resignation of Brigadier-General Joshua M. Varian, of the Third Brigade, has been withdrawn by him, in accordance with the wishes of the officers of that command, and the Adjutant-General, who returned the resignation with the following indorsement:

STATE OF NEW-YORK, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, ALBANY, Nov. 8, 1869.

Respectfully returned to Brigadier-General Joshua M. Varian, commanding Third Brigade N. G. S. N. Y., with the request to my receipt that he should withdraw the same.

(signed) FRANKLIN TOWNSEND, Adjutant-General.

In announcing his reconsideration, General Varian states that, while complying to the request of the Adjutant-General, for reasons given by him, he has not been unmindful of the many requests from the regiments of the brigade, that he should remain with them for a time longer. He is under obligations to the officers and members of the brigade for the many expressions of confidence and esteem, and tendered his since his resignation was forwarded.

Captain Hallenbeck, of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment, offers six silver medals to those members who shall, at the expiration of six months, or at the end of the drill season, exhibit the best attendance at drills during that time.

A Regimental Court Martial is appointed to convene at the armory of the Eighth Regiment,

THE JOHNSON BOND CASE.

Justice Dowling Reconsiders His Decision—Mr. Chesley Relented—Interesting Developments.

The case of BARTON M. JOHNSON, accused of complicity in the larceny of a quantity of United States bonds from the office of the Berkshire Insurance Company at Poughkeepsie, was yesterday advanced a stage by some interesting developments.

It will be remembered that on Friday afternoon Mr. WM. H. CHESLEY, a broker, doing business at No. 62 Broadway, was rather hastily and, as the sequel proved, improperly held by Justice DOWLING for examination on the charge of selling $15,000 worth of the stolen bonds to Mr. WM. COFF, another broker, at No. 4 Pine-street, despite the fact that CHESLEY had volunteered the statement that he had received the bonds from JOHNSON, already under arrest. The Magistrate was in a hurry at the time he ordered the complaint to be taken, hence his inadvertence.

Mr. CHESLEY was kept in confinement at Police Headquarters, instead of the Tombs, as is the frequent though bad practice of the detectives, and both he and JOHNSON were arraigned before the Magistrate yesterday morning, to answer the charges preferred against them.

Mr. COFF exhibited a letter from CHESLEY, which showed that the latter had opened negotiations for the purpose of procuring a loan of $12,000 on the $15,000 worth of bonds alleged to have been stolen. Mr. COFF had advanced the sum of $2,000 in cash, and gave a check for $10,000, payment of which he had subsequently stopped. Mr. CHESLEY here bound up in the character of a witness, and made affidavit to the effect that the United States bond exhibited in Court, and numbered 872, letter B, and which he gave to WM. COFF, had been received from JOHNSON. Mr. CHESLEY stated that he desired to acquit Mr. COFF of any willful participation in his arrest, and offered to hold himself responsible for the $2,000 already advanced, so that Mr. COFF should not be at any loss in the matter. This ended the case so far as Mr. CHESLEY was concerned, and he was yesterday unceremoniously permitted to depart by the Magistrate.

JOHNSON then made an affidavit, in which he stated that he had received the stolen bonds from one JEROME BRADLEY, who is understood to be a character well known to the Police, and it will probably be necessary to secure his attendance in Court. The entire case is a complicated one, and the detectives seem to be quite as much in the muddle as the others interested in the case. An examination will be held to-morrow before Justice HOGAN.

IS HE A LUNATIC?

The Winter Case again before the Courts—Naughty Declarations Concerning a Supreme Court Judge.

WILLIAM WINTER is a young man possessing in his own right an income of about $12,000 per annum. He is by some considered insane, and by others, and those who know him best, as only a half idiot. It appears that he is defective in mental capacity, and that this misfortune has continued from childhood. He inherited a large amount of property, and hence the litigation which has been going on in some of the Courts for a long time. Yesterday the case came before Judge BARNARD, of the Supreme Court, at Chambers, on a motion made for the appointment of one Dr. HARTLEY as a Committee to take charge of the estate of the alleged lunatic in the place of D. C. BURDSALL, Esq., resigned. After the motion had been submitted, Judge BARNARD stated that he had in his possession the affidavits of two persons, and from them he would read a short extract.

[The portions of the affidavits read by Judge BARNARD were to the effect that Dr. HARTLEY in a conversation on Sunday evening last, said, among other things, that he (Judge BARNARD) was a great scoundrel, at the same time using two very profane adjectives before the word "scoundrel." Also that he (HARTLEY) knew the Judge would not appoint him, because he (Judge BARNARD) "was too much of a scoundrel."]

Judge BARNARD said that under no circumstance he did not think he would appoint Dr. HARTLEY to the responsible position of the charge of this estate.

The counsel for Mr. HARTLEY insisted that it was not his client, but a Mr. LIVINGSTON, one of the affiants, who had used the very profane and wrathy language to a Supreme Court Judge, and Judge of this City. Mr. LIVINGSTON, he said, had been concerned in drawing up the papers.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said yes, he had been so engaged, but it was for the reason that he felt that the schemes of certain persons ought to be unmasked and their corruption laid bare before the world.

Judge BARNARD said it would be difficult to persuade him that two young men made up this story out of whole cloth.

Mr. D. C. BURDSALL asserted that his resignation was tendered without any reference to, and wholly independent of, the dispute then being carried on between the parties.

Judge BARNARD accepted Mr. BURDSALL'S resignation, but reserved the appointment of a receiver and the further hearing of the case until Monday morning next.

The Crinoline Council Again—An Unimportant Session.

At Packard's building, yesterday, the organic held, as usual, their weekly meeting, the dancing limbs being done by two or three reporters, (male,) who, after a few cursory glances into the tabooed precincts, were whisked out, sans ceremonie.

Mrs. CHARLES PIERCE, of Boston, was present, and inaugurated business by demanding the reading of the minutes of the previous Saturday. She announced that on the coming Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock, the Woman's Parliament would hold its first formal meeting in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The objects of the present association are the sanitary, moral, social and educational interests of the women and children of New-York. Mrs. Mrs. PIERCE read from the schedule before her.

In scientific education, it was suggested, it would be found indispensable to appeal to scientific men for their cooperation. Mathematical and kindred sciences demanded it imperatively, while there were branches of art education, such as mineral colors, that women could better teach than men.

Sundry questions arose, of unimportant character, however, further than in their relation to the incipient Parliament. These the feminine scribes were requested not to report in detail, whereupon some rotund vocalists, from the seats, while others remained to adjourn with the honorable body at about 3 o'clock.

Board of City Canvassers.

The Board met again yesterday at 11 A. M., Mr. HARDY in the chair.

Protests were received from JOHN A. STEWALLER, candidate for the office of Civil Justice in the Seventh District, alleging that gross frauds have been perpetrated in the Nineteenth Election District of the Nineteenth Ward, and asking that the returns from that district be thrown out; also, from FRANCIS SCHMITZ, candidate for the office of Alderman in the Sixteenth District, alleging that frauds were perpetrated in the making up of the returns of the Eleventh, Twelfth and Nineteenth Election Districts, and asking that the same be thrown out; also, from JOHN RIELLY, candidate for the office of Assistant Alderman in the Sixteenth District, alleging that frauds were perpetrated in the Eleventh, Twelfth, Eighteenth and Nineteenth Election Districts, and asking that the same be thrown out.

The protests were referred to the Committee on Protests.

The Board then took up and canvassed the returns from the Seventh Aldermanic District, after which they adjourned to 10 A. M. on Monday next.

The Charter Election—Tammany Wants a Key to Open Again.

Some of the obscure followers of Tammany are so mortified to think that a few of the Ring nominations were defeated, that they are crying lustily for a new election. They appear to think that if SWEENEY or TWEED should only use fit to order a new election it would have to be held, and they promise themselves to organize repeaters enough next time to make a clean sweep of all the offices. There is no doubt that if the Ring were of a mind to order a new election they could find some of their subservient judges who would decide it to be legal, but they are not likely to take such a step at this time, fearing, doubtless, that they might come off in the next contest worse than they did before. They will, however, do their best to count out the few anti-Tammany candidates that were elected, and among them they are especially anxious to dispose of Police Justice LEDWITH. He is keeping a close watch on them, however, and they will find it a difficult task to carry out their designs. The charges of fraud by the local canvassers in Street 60, which Mr. LEDWITH claims is nearer than any one else, is a matter of security; but it is still true enough to make it an easy matter for the Board of Aldermen to nullify it by their official count.

LAW REPORTS.

DECISIONS.

COMMON PLEAS—GENERAL TERM—DEC. 11.

By Judge Sutherland.

McDermott ex. McDermott; motion granted; costs to abide the event; leave to enter judgment after service of a copy of this order, with leave to defendant to enter the same.

Eaton ex. Kelsey; motion denied without costs; case to be returned, in consideration with opposition of Counsel.

Tuttle ex. Samuel; motion denied without costs.

Gardner ex. Kinsella; motion denied with $10 costs, with leave to renew.

Richardson ex. Mansfield; motion granted on payment of $10 costs.

McGuire ex. Sackett; motion granted.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT—SOUTHERN DISTRICT.

Before Judge Nelson.

SENTENCING OF RAIL.

In the case of James McMahon, who has been held under $2,000 bail for trial on the charge of swindling a soldier out of $100 extra bounty money, and who has been confined in Ludlow-street Jail since July last, the bail was reduced to $500.

SENTENCE.

Vincent or Lawrence and David H. Ecklardt, who pleaded guilty to the charge of passing counterfeit money, were each sentenced to three years' hard labor in the Kings County Penitentiary, and to pay a fine of $1. Mr. W. Field, who pleaded guilty to a similar charge, was brought up for sentence, when it appeared he had pleaded under some misapprehension, he was allowed to withdraw his former plea and plead not guilty. He was remanded for trial.

SUPERIOR COURT—SPECIAL TERM—DEC. 10.

Before Judge McCunn.

SEPARATE—HABEAS CORPUS.

In the matter of the Petition of John Carroll to be released on Habeas Corpus.—Mr. Yard, as counsel, made application before Judge MCCUNN to have an order discharging John Carroll, who was held on a charge of voting illegally on election day.

Mr. Yard stated to the Court that Carroll was arrested for voting illegally as a repeater, that in violation of the law, he was not only detained until the close of the polls, but has been detained ever since, notwithstanding no person appeared to prosecute him before the Magistrate, or elsewhere.

Judge McCunn—Does any person appear to prosecute him now?

Mr. Yard—No, sir.

Judge McCunn—Then I shall order his discharge. When a man comes before me and the evidence is clear that he has been guilty of voting illegally, either without a right to vote, or by voting more than once, I shall certainly punish him severely; but it is a well-known practice with some of the Police Captains in the different Precincts to cause the arrest of numbers of men on election days on the charge of this character, and under authority of the existing law, detain them in the Station House until after the close of the polls, so that they may be prevented from voting at all, or inducing others to vote. This has been done with voters of both parties.

Mr. Blunt, Assistant District-Attorney, then stated to the Court that there was a bill of indictment against the prisoner, he having been indicted for breaking into a house, and having defaulted his bail.

Judge McCunn—How much is the bail.

Mr. Yard—Five hundred dollars.

Judge McCunn—I shall in that case direct that the prisoner renew bail in the same amount or stand committed in default thereof.

The prisoner was remanded to custody until he should furnish the required bond.

SURROGATE'S COURT.

Before Surrogate Tooker.

WILLS ADMITTED.

During the week ending Dec. 11 the wills of the following-named deceased persons have been admitted to probate:

Ezra Buckman, William Brystell, Jos. W. Bell, Albert Vernon, William H. Winters, Jacob Roberts, Samuel A. Cunningham, Andrew Storms, Elizabeth A. Beach, Paul Spofford, Thomas Andrews, Elias S. Spencer.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION.

COURT OF SPECIAL SESSIONS.

Before Justices Kelly and Dowling.

There were forty cases on the calendar in this Court yesterday, very few of which contained any features of special interest.

Albert Frese was sentenced to the Penitentiary for six months for having assaulted a boy, Alexander D. Chicky, for the purpose of stealing a package of checks in his possession.

John Cameron was convicted of stealing a gas jet valued at $25, and was remanded for sentence.

SURROGATE'S COURT, BROOKLYN.

Before Hon. W. D. Veeder.

WILLS PROVED.

The wills of the following named persons were proved in the Kings County Surrogate's Court during the past week: Mary A. Churchman, $10,000; Daniel H. Morgan, $3,000; Wm. Hayden, Stephen Allen Hunt, Jr., $50,000; Eliza Miller, $2,000; David Brown, $10,000; Mary T. Murphy, $2,000; Catharine H. Mathews, $7,000; Morris A Geschecht, $10,000, and C. Brand, all of the City of Brooklyn.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION.

Letters of administration were granted in the estates of Mary Adam White, Mary Kelley, Michael Osborne, M. P. Irving, Bridget Hall and Gerard Brand, all of Brooklyn.

LETTERS OF GUARDIANSHIP.

Letters of guardianship to the estate of Anna Brand were granted to John G. Gross, of Brooklyn.

CITY COURT, BROOKLYN.

Before Judge Thompson.

THE MEAD DIVORCE CASE.

Annie M. Mead vs. Spencer S. Mead.—Robert Roberts, Esq., of counsel for defendant in this suit, appeared before Judge THOMPSON in the City Court yesterday, and made application to have the default opened for the purpose of having a new trial. The case, it will be remembered, came up for trial about two weeks ago, and having been placed on the jury calendar, and not called during the first three weeks of the November term, Mr. P. Barnard, then counsel for the plaintiff, moved to have it placed on the Equity calendar, which was done, and the case came up for trial, when the defendant alleged that they were not ready to proceed. On this ground the motion was granted, and the case went over for trial, so that the defendant may be put on the stand to give his version of the unpleasant affair, which resulted in a separation between himself and wife.

The motion was granted by Judge THOMPSON on defendant paying the alimony, together with the costs of the suit, and to continue paying $10 a week alimony until the case shall be decided.

CHILDREN OF THE STREETS.

Our Newsboys and the Vicissitudes of their Lives.

Views of Lodging Houses and their Inmates.

Work of the Children's Aid Society.

There is a charity in this City that hourly repeats the divine command, "Suffer little children to come unto me," and every night gathers to its sheltering arms hundreds of homeless little vagrants who come hungry and are fed, filthy and are made clean, tired and are given rest. Knowing no creed nor clime in extending its beneficence, it looks only to see the actual need of its queer before it acts. But it does something more and better than merely relieving the physical wants of the young outcasts of metropolitan life. By means of agencies fit upon by happy intuition years ago, and since demonstrated by experience to be eminently wise, the Children's Aid Society has persistently striven, during all the years of its busy life, to render its beneficiaries self-reliant and self-helpful. It has labored unceasingly to win them from vice and idleness, to make them industrious, cleanly, truthful, frugal, and to crown its work of mercy it has led thousands of them out of temptation by transplanting them from the hazards and wretchedness of the City to pleasant, healthful homes in the Western States, where they have grown up to be useful and reputable citizens. Nor has the Society been content with its special mission of rescuing the street boys; but, scantily filled as they have been, has stretched out its helping hands to young girls and women who, by the accidents of human life, have been thrown in the way of temptation. Caring equally for the intellectual culture and the moral and physical improvement of the outcasts of the streets, it has established reading rooms which serve the needy as crutches to their limping to mental light. Multiform as are the agencies of the Society to encourage, comfort and succor the heroes, philosophers and martyrs of metropolitan sin and sorrow, there is one that is preeminent among them all in its capacity for usefulness. No one spending an hour in would hesitate in assigning it the first place even among good works. It is not a pretentious beneficence, nor does it seek to thrust itself upon casual notice, for the building in Park-place hardly has an outward sign of the abounding love and faith that glows within. A broad staircase scrupulously clean leads from the street to the second floor, where a locked door bars progress, but has a bell knob with a friendly "Ring" inscribed upon it. To the visitor it is promptly opened, and Mr. O'CONNOR, the Superintendent, presents his cheerful face. The first glance and the least favorable of the inmates of the house is obtained on the second floor, where the boys are at supper. They sit at a meal that is nutritious and plentiful, but not elegant, or it could not be furnished at six cents per head; nor is it served on costly tablecloths or chinaware. The boys eat greedily, as children of poverty are apt to do, and so swiftly that in a few minutes the repast is over, and they are all found in the schoolroom on the floor above. The visitor preceding them thither sees that they have been there before him, and before going to the table. Off the schoolroom is a large bathroom and another large apartment lined with water-cocks, basins, and towels. All give evidence of recent use, and here we first learn that personal cleanliness is a primary requirement in the institution. The outcast boy steps from the foulness of the streets to the bath, and is made physically clean as the first necessity of his further progress. The water remaining in some of the bath tubs, and all the towels, show how thoroughly he has availed himself of this outward renovation that he so sadly needed. Adjoining these lecture rooms of the purifying creed that "cleanliness is godliness," is a gymnasium fitted with the appliances necessary to expand the puny forms, pinched and warped by poverty and exposure, into fullness and strength. All the remainder of this floor is used as the schoolroom, and a cosy, home-like apartment it is. The neat oilcloth upon the floor, the rows of tiny desks, the prints and mottoes upon the walls, the abundance of light, the pleasant warmth and pure atmosphere make it seem even to the casual visitor a very home indeed. Improving the time the boys are at supper, the dormitories on the two upper floors can be inspected. Each floor has about a hundred beds in one large apartment, so excellently ventilated that every bed can be filled and every occupant have a full supply of fresh air throughout the night. The beds are double mattresses, supplied each with two sheets, an abundance of coverlids and a good feather pillow; the millionaire in his palace certainly has more elegance and privacy in his bed chamber, but no more substantial comfort than is here found by the ragged urchin who sells him his newspaper in the street car.

DESCRIPTION OF THE INMATES.

Coming down stairs again, these urchins are found assembled in the schoolroom. Usually there are about one hundred of them, ranging in years from 5 to 15, and in size from the knee-high child to the overgrown boy of full stature. Ancestral poverty has put its brand on every one of them. There is little of the freshness and guilelessness of childhood about them. It is plain that each of them when he tottered from his cradle—if he ever had one—was forced to put out his puny arms and wrestle with the great strong world for existence. There has been a deal of sentimental talk about life struggle, but these poor boys, who have a consciousness of what it means, have found no poetry in it. To be born in the gutters and to live in them, to snatch a scant subsistence from an unwilling world, as the miser's hungry dog wrings from his master's hand the bone he is munching, to be the lowliest among the lowly, to be foulest among the foul, and to be bankrupt of hope and faith, is to be as these boys and to have a life struggle. That boys born as they are and reared as they are do not universally become as the brutes that browse, is the very strongest proof that in His image man was made.

And these boys come greatly from the Slough of Despond, if the world will but extend the tip of its little finger to steady them. All the boys in the schoolroom have had thus much of God's love moving in man's grace, and they seem as robust men striding on firm ground. They are, indeed, all ragged and unkempt. Their feet are generally bare and their heads close shaven. Even their faces, at a first glance, are almost painful to look upon, for they show so plainly how the world has put its heel upon them. But look closer, and the promise of capabilities the ordeal has not crushed out is seen. Eyes still brighten at a kindly word, cheeks are suffused with a modest demeanor detected; the boys have hope and shame left, and are not lost. It is hardly necessary to describe them in detail. Every reader every day encounters scores of newsboys in the streets, and if he can imagine one of these saucy, pushing, dirty urchins washed clean and toned down by the influence of a Christian home, he can realize the average of the inmates of the Newsboys' Lodging House. There are exceptions, of course, and some are constantly found. The two bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, curly-haired boys of about six and nine years, who sit on the front bench, joining in the hymn with such fervent zeal, have the fine features that show the gentler breed, and that their heritage of vagabondage was not transmitted from a remote ancestry. And the black-haired boy, of eight years, whose rounded limbs and general air show how sturdily he has withstood the wear and tear of being the world's shuttlecock, betrays the precious manliness hidden in his little frame by the proud humility with which he declares he has fifty cents to put in the savings bank. Among all the four-score faces there is scarcely one that is brutal, and it is owing to the fact that they are taught by singing our exceptions, that we arrive at correct conclusions concerning them.

THE OUTCASTS REDEEMED.

There are thousands of homeless boys in the streets of New-York. There they are profane, turbulent, disinclined for what they are and may be. Put them into the Newsboys' Lodging House and they are transformed. They are docile, and are distinguished chiefly by their own self-respect. An oath is never heard, quarreling seldom occurs, insubordination is so rare as to be remarkable. There is a deal of "chaffing" and "divvying" going on while the boys are in the house, but no wicked turbulence. In the streets they were incorrigible gamblers, but in the House they never risk their earnings by pitching pennies. Seeming to wallow in the filth of the gutters as a natural delight, they come to the House baths as to a beatitude. Sleeping in garbage boxes and doorways, they naturally contract the habits of vagabondage; but in the House they drop them, and go to bed as orderly and decently as though they had been nurtured in Christian homes from their cradles. Untaught wasteful in the streets is the House they become as frugal that they are changed into bank depositors. And all these happy results are reached by the simplest agencies, chief among which is a trust in the boys themselves. There is no compulsion in their becoming patrons of the House. They come of their own will, and therefore come expecting to yield to its restraints. The payment of six cents each for lodging, supper and breakfast begets a feeling of independence that is wholesome and elevating. The establishment of a savings bank in the House has taught them habits of frugality and shown them the value of accumulation. The institution of a night school has fostered their desire for self-culture, and the extending of religious instruction has done much to eradicate that wild ferocity formerly so characteristic of the class. Hundreds do not become regular patrons of the House, but even two or three nights spent there has its effect and helps to wean the mass from shiftlessness and wickedness. During the past nine months 7,283 different boys have been partakers of its comforts, and of these 649 have been provided with homes, and 641 who were truants were restored to their friends. To feed and lodge them $19,449 have been expended, and of this amount the boys have paid $9,189. The House is conducted on a novel principle in being part pay and part charity. The stipulated price of meals and beds is asked of all, but no boy is refused either if he has no money to pay. It was thought that this method would involve discomforts and difficulties, but in practice it has been admirable, and is indeed rather an advantage. The boy bankrupt by the vicissitudes of to-day may be in funds to-morrow, and as a rule those who come penniless ask for credit rather than alms, and rarely fail to liquidate the debts contracted in an impecunious stress. In this rule, as in all others, the boys have readily acquiesced, but the managers have wisely forestalled opposition by usually securing the consent of the boys by vote to the usage before it becomes part of the discipline of the House.

SENDING TO THE FAR WEST.

But great humanitarian as it is, the Newsboys' Lodging House is, in fact, a minor agency in the elevation of the refuse of the streets. It takes the boys in the rough, and peels off some of the incrustations of years of vagrancy and degradation, and prepares them for the better life which it provides by taking them from the City altogether and placing them in pleasant homes among the farmers of the Western States. Hundreds are thus transplanted every year, and in almost every case are a credit to the Society and a positive gain to the persons who receive them. The value of transplanting not only to the homeless boys, but to the City, cannot be overestimated, for without it and the agencies that render it possible, a large per cent. of these young vagrants would inevitably drift into thievery or pauperism, and in either case would become public burdens. Therefore, the work of the Society is not only humanitarian but economic, and deserving of more encouragement for this more sordid reason than it has received from our citizens generally. And the Society can claim that aid for much more than the Newsboys' Lodging House. It is many handed as well as large hearted, and, besides that primal institution, supports the Eighteenth-street Lodging House, which during the past year has furnished 15,508 lodgings and 15,429 meals; the Phelps Lodging House, No. 225 Rivington-street, which has provided 16,512 lodgings and 9,888 meals; Eleventh Ward Lodging House, No. 709 East Eleventh-street, 10,480 lodgings and 10,589 meals. In all these cases the object is the same as at the Park-place establishment, to reach and benefit homeless and friendless boys, to shield them from temptation and throw around them the purifying and elevating influences of a home. In addition to all this, the Society has five free reading rooms at different points in the City, and labors constantly in every way to mitigate the great evil of youthful vagrancy and pauperism that is so prevalent in the Metropolis. It has devoted itself mainly to boys, but has established also a Girls' Lodging House at No. 135 Bleecker-street, that is a moral quarantine and an ark of refuge for young girls who find themselves adrift in the streets, from whence they can be passed to situations that are obtained for them. The managers say of it, that it "is not designed for fallen women, or women at all. It is intended for children and young girls, and especially for those who have not passed the line of virtue. The orders to the Superintendent are to refuse all applicants over eighteen years of age, unless plainly cases of great suffering." Limited as is its sphere and the capacity of the house it occupies, it is a vast benefit to the City, and many similar institutions should be established and supported by the voluntary charity of our citizens.

CLOSING WORDS.

It has been our aim to briefly call public attention to one of our most powerful agencies for the decrease of crime and pauperism. The newsboys have been selected for extended mention because they are the most familiar to the public and are most typical of metropolitan degradation and capabilities. They, of all others, struggle hardest for a bare subsistence, are most exposed to temptation, are most keen, pushing, restless, active, indomitable of all the youth who infest our thoroughfares. Left to the attrition of the streets, they may survive the terrible ordeal, but the chances are that they will go to ruin. When it is remembered that there is an average of twenty thousand street boys constantly roaming through the City, the great importance of the problem they present is apparent, and when it is known that during the fourteen years of the labors of the Children's Aid Society the number of homeless little outcasts has actually decreased, and that there has not been any increase, in proportion to increase of the population, in the crimes to which they naturally betake themselves, an idea can be formed of the great benefit of that Society to the City.

The Reorganization of the Republican Party—Appeal to Electors.

The following appeal has just been issued to the Republican electors of the Seventh Assembly District of this City:

To the Republican Electors of the Seventh Assembly District:

A reorganization of the Republican Party of this City is about to take place, under the auspices of the last State Convention, with a view to secure greater harmony, purity and efficiency in our party. The first step in reorganization is to be the enrollment of Republican voters in their several Assembly districts on the evenings of the 16th and 17th of December, from 7 to 9 P. M., at which times and places we shall personally meet the enrolling officer and have our name registered. The Republicans thus enrolled will constitute the Republican Associations of their several Assembly districts, who will manage the party affairs, hold primary elections, and select delegates to all State, County, Congressional, City, Ward and other Conventions, and thus give all the party nominations in this City. Every Republican who becomes enrolled thereby enables himself to take part in the nomination of candidates for public office, and to have an active voice in the direction of party affairs. If not enrolled, he cannot participate in such nominations or affairs. All good citizens of Republican politics should therefore take care to enroll, that they may have both the privilege of exercising in the most effective way, our great adopted system, those most important political functions. There is a great work of reform in the Assembly District. Good men have neglected their primary political duties. Unworthy candidates have been thrust upon us, elections lost to us, and a class of Republican society of three or four hundred votes has been habitually thrown away. The primary meeting has become a wretched farce. Fair, deliberative nominating conventions are unknown. A handful of men has usurped one of the primary and most valuable political franchises of the Republican, of the populous district—the right to select candidates for public office—a franchise which is prized in the land of our fathers, and which should be as jealously guarded by fellow-citizens, we may say, as our lives and liberties. Than you have in the Ordinance of Republican principles, Proper institutions for the advancement of Republican principles, Proper institutions for conducting a fierce trial in this City. We propose to save, as having a common interest in the welfare of our City, the right to search out and select the men who secure the right to take an active part in the government of our City. The Republican party is the party of the Republican Party in this City. The primary meetings have been obtained by chance, and the interests of many of the wisest and purest citizens of this City and State. The opportunity is now offered to change all this, and make our primary meetings what they should be—honest, powerful, harmonious and pure.

DISASTROUS FIRES.

Six Buildings in West-Avenue Destroyed—A Man Burned to Death—Serious Fire in Broadway.

Between 1 and 2 o'clock yesterday morning flames were seen issuing from one of the six two-story frame buildings, Nos. 814, 816, 818, 820, 822 and 824 First-avenue, and owing to the combustible character of the houses they were all totally consumed. They were owned by a Mr. VOLKENBURG, whose loss is estimated at $6,000. Nos. 814 and 816 were unoccupied. No. 818 was occupied by GEORGE LYONS, harness maker, whose loss is $600; No. 1820 as an oyster saloon by J. BOEKEM, whose loss is $900; No. 822 was used as a shoe store, which was damaged to the amount of $200; No. 824, by JOHN MAHON, as a liquor store, whose loss of $1,000 is fully covered by insurance. After the fire had burned itself out, a patrolman of the Nineteenth Precinct found the charred and unrecognizable remains of a man in the ruins of No. 818. As this house was unoccupied, none of the neighbors could give any information leading to the identity of the victim.

FIRE IN BROADWAY.

At 4 o'clock yesterday morning a workman in the fur rooms of WILLIAM ETTENGER, on the third floor of No. 461 Broadway, dropped a coal of fire in some sizing. The material took fire, and before the flames were subdued serious damage was done. The loss of ETTENGER on furs was $6,000, but he was insured in the following Companies: Park, $2,000; Washington, $2,500; Relief, $2,500; North Britain and Mercantile, of London, $5,000; Hanover, $5,000; Liverpool, London and Globe, $2,500; Globe, of New-York, $2,000; Niagara, $5,000; North American, $5,000; Lafayette, $2,500; Home, $2,000; Williamsburg City, $2,500. R. THOMPSON & Co., importers and manufacturers of bonnets and hats on the second floor, suffered by water to the extent of $200. HORACE WATERS lost sheet music on the first floor, suffered $1,000 damage to pianos, but was insured for $20,000 in the Williamsburg City, Merchant's of Chicago, Western of Buffalo, Fire and Marine of Buffalo, Lumberman, Merchant's of New-York, and the Hide and Leather.

The Spanish Gunboats.

The Spanish engineers and a number of officers of the war steamer Pizarro visited the gunboats at DELAMATER'S basin, foot of West Thirteenth-street, yesterday. It was intended to take some of them up the North River on a trial trip, and steam was got up for this purpose on board of six of them; but, owing to the lateness of the hour, the trip was postponed until to-morrow. Eighteen of these vessels are completed, according to the description given of them in these columns some time since. They are thirty in number, propellers, fore and aft schooner-rigged, and will carry, each, a 100-pound Parrott gun. The total cost of each vessel is said to be about $60,000. It was proposed by Captain ARRAGON, the Spanish agent in charge of the flotilla, to moor the finished vessels in the stream, under the guns of the Pizarro, who has taken her station directly off the basin in the North River. Last night the Marshal's men still held watch over the vessels, and every precaution was taken by the parties interested in their welfare to protect them.

Señor ROBERTS, the Spanish Minister, arrived in this City from Washington yesterday, and the gunboats were immediately turned over to him by the Government authorities. They will take clearance for Cuba on Tuesday next.

Departure of Pere Hyacinthe.

Father HYACINTHE took his departure yesterday for France by the steamer Perseire. He left the Fifth-avenue Hotel at 9 A. M. for Pier No. 50, accompanied by Mr. DARLING and two members of the Société Francais de Bienfaisance. He was cordially welcomed on board by Captain DUCHESNE, and spent nearly an hour on deck with his friends before the signal for departure was given. He has promised to visit our country again and make an extensive tour over the States.

The Lorillard Swiss Village in Westchester.

Mr. JACOB LORILLARD, of this City, intends to found a Swiss village near Fordham Park, in Westchester County, eleven miles from the City Hall. The carrying out of this design will prove highly advantageous to a class of community that, hitherto, have been compelled to put up with insufficient accommodations at very high rents. The land set apart as a site for the proposed village, is a part of the old Lorillard estate, fronts on the New-York and Harlem Railroad, and adjoins the spacious grounds of St. John's College, which lie to the east of it. The plot on which the village is to be built comprises 2,300 building lots, none of which are less than 25 by 100 feet, and many are much larger. Surveys have already been made, and streets laid out, so that nothing prevents active operations being commenced in the spring. Mr. LORILLARD will build fifty cottages, himself, all of them to be in the Swiss style of architecture, and appropriately finished throughout. Several French citizens have already purchased lots in this new village, and will build thereon in the spring. These, in addition to fifty to be erected by Mr. LORILLARD, will give the new "ville" an animated appearance before the Summer of 1870 shall have closed.

Thieves on Ocean Steamers—The Police on the Sea.

Yesterday afternoon Detective JAMES IRVING, of the Central Police, sailed for Europe on the steamer City of Paris, and that fact becoming known, caused inquiries to be made as to the reason of his voyage. Inspector DILKS declared that he was only going as a witness in a civil suit in England, which was a consequence of an accident to a lady passenger which IRVING chanced to see during his former voyage. Higher authority, however, declared that he had sailed upon regular detective business, and in consequence of an agreement arrived at between the Police of this City and London, it appears that for some time past the passengers by the steamers of the Inman line have been mercilessly plundered by adroit thieves, who have taken passage from both sides, for the purpose of plying their vocation. These robberies have been so constant and continuous, and their gross amount has reached such an enormous sum, that the Company have at last been compelled to ask protection from the Police. This has been accorded, and detectives from London and this City will sail upon each steamer until the pilferers are driven from the line. Superintendent KENNEDY denies that this is the reason for Detective IRVING'S departure, but there is good reason for believing that it is the object of his mission, nevertheless.

The Surrogate's Office—Closing up Business.

Hon. GIDEON J. TUCKER, who has creditably performed the duties of Surrogate for the past six years, retires from office on the 1st of January prox. He leaves to his successor a perfectly clear calendar, which could hardly be said of any other judicial office in this City. The business of the office has been kept up so close that there only remain two contested cases to be tried before the expiration of Mr. TUCKER'S term. The reports of the Surrogate have also been kept up with remarkable punctuality, and the last volume, containing reports of cases decided during the present month, will be published by RANDS before the beginning of the new year. On his retirement from office Mr. TUCKER will resume the practice of law in this City, devoting his attention especially to wills and the settlement of estates.

A Swedish Lutheran Church was organized at Keokuk, Iowa, last September.

Of 2,000 Lutheran ministers in this country only about 1,800 are engaged as pastors.

The First Baptist Church of Chicago is erecting a Home for the infirm poor of the Church.

There are in the United States 1,160 German Catholic priests, 705 parishes, and a German Catholic population of 1,044,000 souls. If the average population of the non-German Catholic parishes is about equal to that of the German, the total Catholic population of the United States would amount to 2,350,000.

A correspondent of the American Churchman, writing from San Francisco, says: "Pleading God by proxy is done at a good round price! The quartettes in three of our own churches cost about $10,000, or, in each, at the rate of from $60 to $75 a Sunday. Our Bishop has been in California over fifteen years, and I believe in that time has received less from the diocese than the above churches pay their quartettes in a year! Are we the Episcopal Church or the Quartette Church? Which, by the fact?"

The Quarter Centennial of the First Congregational Church of Detroit takes place this week. The different pastors of the Church who are expected to participate in the exercises are: Rev. H. S. HAMMOND, of Chicago; Rev. Dr. KITCHEL, now President of Middlebury College, Vt.; Rev. S. M. FREELAND and Rev. Dr. BALLARD.

Alleged Theft by Longshoremen.

United States Commissioner SHIELDS received a complaint yesterday against two longshoremen, THOS. REDDER and THOS. ROGERS, who were accused by Police Sergeant EDWIN O'BRIEN of stealing sails from the Anchor Line, a Government vessel. The property was represented to be worth $400. The accused claimed that they bought it on Staten Island for $25. They were committed to Ludlow-street Jail in default of bail.
